The Agriculturist’s White Grubs.

The most important article just published in the "Amateur's Almanac," is on the subject of "White Grubs". The description of the white grub as it hinders and injures the crops, together with the different stages of its growth. The life and death of the grub can be seen.

There are two species of white grubs in this country, the white grub and the black grub. The black grub is the more injurious, as it is more abundant and attacks a greater variety of plants. The white grub is less injurious, as it is not so abundant and attacks only a few species of plants.

The white grub is a white, worm-like insect, about an inch long. It has a soft, pliable body, and is very active. It feeds on the roots of various plants, and is particularly destructive to young grass and clover. It also attacks corn, potatoes, and other vegetables.

The grub is about the size of a large pea, and is white in color. It has a soft, pliable body, and is very active. It feeds on the roots of various plants, and is particularly destructive to young grass and clover. It also attacks corn, potatoes, and other vegetables.

To kill the grubs, it is necessary to destroy the grubs by burning, or by digging them up and destroying them. The grubs can be destroyed by burning, or by digging them up and destroying them. It was true he had made that observation at the time of our commencement, but I could not understand why he should have said it. And up and down, I've wandered dreary years, my little form and hushed my sobs to rest.

CRUCIFIXION OF OUR SAVIOR.

TWO THIEVES.

The most prominent event of the present week in the American Arms, was the capture of Forts Jackson and St. Philip, at New Orleans, by the troops of the United States, under the command of General Butler. The fortifications were of a very formidable character, and had been constructed with great skill and thought. The American forces, under the command of General Grant, had been in possession of the town and its environs for some time, and had been engaged in reducing the fortifications. The attack was made on the 14th of the month, and the fighting was very severe. The fortifications were well defended, and the American troops were severely repulsed. The attacking force, however, was vastly superior in numbers, and the fortifications were soon taken.

The capture of the forts was a great victory for the American forces, and gave them control of the Mississippi River. The Mississippi was a key waterway for trade and communication, and its control gave the United States a strategic advantage in the war. The Union forces were now able to move troops and supplies more easily, and the Confederacy was forced to retreat.

The victory was a major turning point in the war, and helped to turn the tide in favor of the Union. It was a significant blow to the Confederacy, and helped to put an end to the war in the South. The capture of the forts was a major victory for the Union, and helped to give them control of the Mississippi River.

In conclusion, the capture of Forts Jackson and St. Philip was a significant event in the American Civil War. It gave the Union control of the Mississippi River, and helped to turn the tide in favor of the Union. It was a major turning point in the war, and helped to pave the way for the eventual victory of the Union.
