The same plan shows a very fair deal of duration and keeping room, two bedrooms, kitchen, sitting room, bedroom and living room, to a 30 by 40 by 10 foot building.

There is a fashionable style of dwellings, called villas and cottages, the first attracting the attention of the fashionable, the second of the farmers and middling classes. The same amount of room is, therefore, obtained, and the same kind of arrangement, and the same amount of expense is incurred, but the style of the villa is more costly, and the cottage more serviceable. There should be such an arrangement in every cottage, or it has no claim to the name of cottage. The River for General Shear

It is not at all strange that I occasionally had this advantage—I could exchange my wet first sufferings of the harmless animals. But I was in a piece of sheep's gray, a cleansed wool. It is not at all strange that I occasionally possessed the idea that it was not at all strange that I occasionally had this advantage. I could exchange my wet first sufferings of the harmless animals. But I was in a piece of sheep's gray, a cleansed wool. i

The Scene

A rural village with a small church, a few houses, and a store. The sky is blue with some clouds.

The Characters

General Shear, Mr. North, Mrs. North, Mr. and Mrs. South, Mr. and Mrs. East, Mr. and Mrs. West, and the local farmers.

The Plot

General Shear is visiting the village and meets the local farmers. He tells them about his successful farm and how he manages it. He also talks about the importance of wool and how it can be processed. The farmers are impressed and ask him many questions.

The Dialogue

General Shear: "You must take care of your wool. It is a valuable resource."

Mr. South: "How do you process the wool?"

General Shear: "We wash the wool, then we card it and spin it. Then we weave it into cloth."

Mrs. North: "What do you do with the wool that is left over?"

General Shear: "We sell it to manufacturers who make it into clothes."
