WESTERN EDITORIAL NOTES.

Dr. John KENNICOTT was a zealous friend of Indian Education. On this subject, he wrote a remarkable work, entitled "The Education of the American Indian," which has been widely read and appreciated. He was also a strong advocate of the emancipation of the slaves, and used his influence and position to promote this noble cause. He was a man of great ability and integrity, and is mourned by his friends and countrymen as a loss to the profession to which he belonged.

DOLL

About this time, when there was a prospect of a new edition of the "Rural New Yorker," Dr. KENNICOTT was engaged in revising and improving the contents of the paper. He drew young men to him by his genial confidence and sound judgment. His articles always commanded attention. They were written with discrimination and a fund of agricultural knowledge, and his works will live after him. Peace to his memory.

THE BATTLE OF THE SHIRE

Tactics is a matter of good horses that appear even in their garters. A bank of stone there may not be in the very center of the line. The horses of one of the two parties are especially adapted to the purpose of a charge, and the opposing army must be put to flight.

The horses of the Shire are renowned for their speed and agility, while the horses of the East are noted for their strength and endurance. The horse of Middle-earth is a versatile creature, able to perform a variety of tasks.

The warhorse of the West is a spirited animal, quick to respond to the command of its rider. Its maned coat is a sleek and glistening red, and its tail flutters with the wind. It is adorned with a bridle of silver and a saddle of finest leather. The footfall of the warhorse is a rumble on the ground, and the cry of the rider is a war-cry of victory.

The horse of the East is a massive creature, its body a gleaming white as the moon. Its mane and tail are a shimmering silver, and its eyes gleam like the stars in the night sky. Its hooves are iron, and its breath is fire. The footfall of the warhorse is a大地震, and the cry of the rider is a battle-cry of thunder.

The warhorse of the Shire is a sturdy animal, its body a rich brown. Its mane and tail are a chestnut brown, and its eyes are a piercing green. Its hooves are strong, and its breath is a fragrant breeze. The footfall of the warhorse is a gentle thud, and the cry of the rider is a call of peace.

Its hooves are iron, and its breath is fire. The footfall of the warhorse is a大地震, and the cry of the rider is a battle-cry of thunder. This horse is known as the Great White Horse of the East, and it is feared by the enemies of Middle-earth.

Firing was heard in the direction of United States Ford this afternoon.

A note was sent to the enemy, and they had five large brigades, under the command of major general J. B. Gordon, who was ordered to the north side of the Rappahannock.

KNOWING AT THE DOOR.

A TRUE STORY.

Two growing girls of a different acquaintance, standing opposite the little village school, and more or less bent on fashioning themselves in the likeness of their older sisters. Among them all, little Katie's answer was the most satisfactory. Her countenance was as bright as her name. "Be patient, she said, "be patient, my little one; always patient and kind and gentle."

But when the bell rang, what was the surprise! Pale, and with all the signs of illness, came the little brother. He called for his father, and the little sister. She was not there. She was only in the hoy, he said, and had failed to return. She was last seen in the company of a stranger. She was last seen in the company of a stranger. She was last seen in the company of a stranger.

"Oh, yes," said Katie, with resignation, "it is the only thing."
