Agricultural and the Government.

It is known to most of our readers that there is a Department of Agriculture, the general details and duties of which are: to promote and encourage the growth of the agricultural sciences; to foster the cause of agriculture; to prevent the introduction of injurious plants, animals, etc.; to protect the interests of farmers; and to do all in its power to bring forth things new and old. The Department is now the most complete agricultural literary and scientific journal in the world, and its staff of assistants is recruited from among the ablest and most thoughtful, considerate and inquiring men, to whom it is necessary to call upon to contribute information to Agricultural journals.

The Department is now the most complete agricultural literary and scientific journal in the world, and its staff of assistants is recruited from among the ablest and most thoughtful, considerate and inquiring men, to whom it is necessary to call upon to contribute information to Agricultural journals.

When writing to the Department or to the Government, it is advisable to address the Department with which they are acquainted, and to state briefly the nature and extent of the correspondence desired.

To former members of the RURAL BRIGADE, who have written to the Department and have not received a reply, we can state that the Department is now the most complete agricultural literary and scientific journal in the world, and its staff of assistants is recruited from among the ablest and most thoughtful, considerate and inquiring men, to whom it is necessary to call upon to contribute information to Agricultural journals.

HAY AND STRAW, CUT AND UNCUT, AS COMFORTS OR MUSKOM.

In times like these when everything edible is at a high price, it is important to know how to stretch one's money. A common practice is to grow hay and straw in one's yard. However, this can be a challenge, especially in areas with limited space.

The first step is to ensure that the land is fertile and has good drainage. Soil pH, organic matter, and nutrient content should be tested. Next, choose the type of hay or straw to grow, considering factors such as desired protein content, digestibility, and tolerance to various weather conditions.

Fertilizers and pesticides may be necessary to optimize crop production. Crop rotation and cover crops can also help maintain soil health.

Harvesting hay and straw requires timely and effective equipment. Machinery such as mowers, balers, and windrowers can be used. For hay, the optimal time to harvest is when plants are in full growth but before seeds have formed. Straw can be harvested when plants are dead ripe, and the timothy is cut after it has shed its last flowers.

Once harvested, hay and straw need to be cured properly. This involves spreading the material on the ground to allow for air circulation and evaporation of moisture. Hay should be stored in well-ventilated areas to prevent mold and pests.

Feeding hay and straw to livestock requires careful consideration. The type of livestock, its age, and the feeding goal (growth, maintenance, or reproduction) all influence the feeding strategy.

In summary, growing and managing hay and straw requires a combination of knowledge, planning, and effective practices. Stay updated with local agricultural tips and consult with extension services or on-farm advisors to get the best results.

It looked like a hundred I'd seen before,
With his face upturned to the starlit dome,
As the daylight fled all the long hills o'er,
like an island in the ocean.
