SAVED FROM HIMSELF.

A beautiful garden, full of rare flowers, and a girl as rarely beautiful as they. But to-day Eunice Ray's lovely face wears a cloud, and the calm depths of her blue eyes are troubled; for she is waiting for her lover, and she knows that the coming hour must decide for weal or woe her whole future life. Three years before, by her dying mother's side (then only a girl of fifteen months), she had promised solemnly never to wed one who was addicted to intemperate habits, smoked cigarettes, talked about Mrs. Langtry, or purchased his clothing elsewhere than at the Union Clothing Co.'s.

When six months ago she had met Claude Erle (brother of Lib's), he had seemed everything that was noble. The more she had seen of him the more her heart had instinctively gone out to him, and at length when he had asked for the precious boon of her hand in marriage she had given him without hesitation the answer he craved, on condition that he bought his wedding tie at the Union Clothing Co.'s.

For a while the course of their wooing had run in the smoothest, most blissful of channels, but lately a shadow had come over the brilliancy of Eunice's happy love-dream. For some time reports had been brought to her ears of her lover's gradually growing dissipation. At first with an indignant scorn she had refused to believe; but too soon she had been forced to the conviction that what she had heard had some foundation in beer.

A step came up the path to where Eunice sat. The step was not the step Eunice sat upon, for the step that Eunice sat upon had been painted "Large or Small fitted at the Union Clothing Co.'s."

"Ah, here she is! My little queen in the midst of her subjects." Claude dropped, as he spoke, a handful of fragrant blossoms in her lap, and then dropped himself by her side. She dropped.

Then, for the first time, he noticed the troubled expression her face wore, and attributing it to some trivial cause, which his presence would soon comfort, began lightly to question her.

For a few moments the girl hesitated to hesitate. As she gazed up into his handsome, laughing eyes, she shrank from speaking words which might drive him in anger from her side, and separate her for all time from him. She loved with an intensity such as a nature like hers could feel but once. But at length she began in a low voice, which gathered firmness and phlegm as she went on. First she told him of her solemnly uttered vow to her dying parent, and then of what she had heard concerning his intemperate habits, mashing, lushing, etc.

A dark flush of anger sprang to Claude's face as he rose to his feet, exclaiming, "I will not say that what you have heard is false—I will not tell an untruth—but what matters it if in the society of jovial friends I have once in a while overstepped the bounds of inebriety? Eunice, I thought that you loved me, but I see I was mistaken."

Eunice's face grew very pale as she listened to the torrent of passionate words his wounded pride had dictated.

The remainder of this beautiful story will be continued at the Union Clothing Co.'s tall building, any fine day that the store is not too full of customers.
