Class History, January 1936

Blinded by the brightness of pure snow as it lay glittering in an early morning sunlight, we entered John Marshall for the first time in January, 1932.

Laughing, singing, shouting, and clanging of lockers echoed on all sides while new faces swam mockingly before our eyes. To such small freshmen those halls seemed quite as spacious and lengthy as could be desired. How much more so must this splendid building seem to the present eighth graders; the first of their kind in Marshall.

However, we seem to have gotten over our shyness readily, and enjoyed the activities of a freshmen club, headed by Miss Van de Walle and Mr. Eike. From their groans, we learned that we were quite the usual run of freshmen, noisy and unrestrainable.

The school was so crowded at that time, that the freshmen had to report only four periods in the afternoon, thus losing out on activities. The most outstanding events of our history include a class picnic at Sea Breeze Park in our Sophomore year, and a successful Halloween Party when Juniors.

And now in our Senior year, we share double honors, being the first graduating class of the new building and at the same time, the last Senior class to depart in January.

We, the Classes of January and June 1936, wish to express our appreciation to the English and Art Departments whose contributions have added so much to our Senior Annual.

Class History, June 1936

On the opening day of school in September, 1932, many gawky green freshmen stumbled into the halls of John Marshall High School, as it used to be. They were astounded by the numerous intelligent looking upperclassmen who were all hurrying some place, while they stood around and gaped.

These freshmen of the class of June, 1936, had their first meeting as a group Thursday, September 22, at 3:30 in room 124. Mrs. Fuller and Mr. Delong were introduced as class advisers. The class members elected the following as officers: president Roy Bachetta; vice-president Craig Culbertson; secretary Jane DeWolf. They were introduced at another meeting, October 19.

As time went on, these green freshmen were transformed into typical high school students. They joined clubs of their own choice and began to take part in the activities of the school.

In the fall of 1933 the class as an organization was dropped and clubs started. This new method provides a separate club for the girls and boys of each class. Instead of the two class advisers, each club has one permanent adviser.

We, the members of the graduating class, have seen many customs come and go. New ones have come—old ones have gone. Class activity was changed into club activity. We have witnessed the changing of the senior play into an activity of the dramatics club. We remember once calling our school paper "Jo-Mar" instead of "The Marshall Docket." We have seen new departments come and old departments improved. We have witnessed the birth and growth of this new building, as well as the old age and death of the old building.

We are, in a certain sense, travelers. We have traveled through the "Land of Having Nothing At All" into the "Land of Having Everything" and soon will pass into the "Land of Losing Everything That One Hath Possessed" and still later we will travel through the "Land of Knowing What One Hath Missed."

The "Land of Having Nothing" was the old school, but we did not realize how little we had until we reached the "Land of Having Everything" or the new school. The "Land of Losing Everything" is graduation. The "Land of Knowing What One Hath Missed" is the years after graduation. Then will we realize and regret the many opportunities which we failed to take while in high school.

These last few weeks of our senior year will be crowded, for it has suddenly dawned upon us how short these four years have been. We have learned this one thing—"Time comes and goes like the wind."

The present John Marshall Choir has evolved from a combination of the glee and choral clubs of last season. Last fall, the choir accepted a number of invitations to sing for local communities, with such marked success that this year they have received and accepted an invitation to appear at the Rochester Chamber of Commerce, December 12.

Gowns, designed and made by members of the school organization and composed of the school colors, will present a striking contrast with previous occasions, when the choir appears in public.

The John Quill represents a story of the organizations, studies, and other activities in which the seniors participated during their four years at John Marshall. The book is compiled by a selected group of seniors with the assistance of two faculty advisers. Works of literary and artistic character contributed by members of the school also make up an important part of the annual.

The Senior Orchestra is the goal for those in the Training Orchestra, The Band and Orchestra, student organizations, created not only for those belonging to them, but for the benefit of the entire student body, provide an opportunity for cultural, professional and recreational training.

Four Clubs

In 1933 all the small groups were abolished and in their place eight clubs were organized on a class basis—namely, Freshmen, Sophomore, Junior and Senior clubs. Each group has a definite aim, but the general purpose of all the clubs is to give the young people of John Marshall High School opportunities for a well rounded life.

The aim of the Freshmen Club is to give the Freshmen an idea as to what high school really is and to help them become better acquainted in their new surroundings; of the Sophomore Club, to discuss social conduct and settle questions concerning requirements for graduation; of the Junior Club, to develop a pleasing personality; of the Senior Club, to help choose a suitable vocation.

These boys' and girls' clubs meet alternately every Tuesday with a far greater membership than there was under the old set-up of small groups.

The Student Secretaries

This organization provides the girls chosen as student secretaries with valuable training, and gives them experience which will benefit them when applying for positions later on. These girls assist the department heads in their office routine by typewriting notices and letters, filing records, and answering phone calls. Since a girl has to be very capable to fulfill this position, only those girls in the Commercial Department who have good scholarship are eligible. Besides being educational the work is interesting, and earns for the girls thirty-five credits toward an activity award.

Honor Patrol

The Honor Patrol is divided into several branches—namely, corridor, cafeteria, outside traffic, and messengers for the office.

The duties of those pupils in the corridor are to keep students out of halls during sessions, unless they have a definite reason for being there, and to inform visitors who may come to the school. The duties of those in the cafeteria are to keep it tidy, check conduct, and to stand guard at the exits until the bell rings. It is the duty of those of the outside traffic squad to see that pupils cross the street at the proper time and place. The name, messenger, explains the duty of those in the office; they deliver important notices to pupils and teachers during the periods.

Soccer is probably the most interesting sport in high school athletics. Not only does it provide enjoyment for the players, but also many thrills for the spectators. It requires athletic ability and stamina.

Robert Popp was the outstanding member of the team, being chosen as an all-scholastic player.

Several of Marshall's pin topplers turned out this year to make up a team which is hoped will finish near the top when the lengthy inter-scholastic league season is brought to a close.

Bowling requires a high degree of skill plus the mental ability to come through in a pinch. Marshall's team combines both of these qualities. With a little luck they are bound to form a winning combination.

This year Robert Popp and Thomas McKeon are acting as co-captains.

This year for the first time, Marshall's court team will not be handicapped in any way by its gymnasium. Mr. Makin expects to develop a group of sharpshooters with a total of eight baskets in the large gym.

Our fair, young lassies in our Riding Club are under the capable guidance of Mrs. Lay. The class has become so large this year that it is now necessary to have two classes. One group rides on Wednesday, and the other rides on Saturday.

Track Team

Marshall's track team has been steadily gaining its reputation under the able coaching of Mr. Makin. This sport is probably the most strenuous of school athletics and it requires a great deal of energy on the part of the participants.

Next season promises to be one of inspiring ambitions for the Orange and Blue with the return of all but seven of the veterans of last June. Many of the returning runners have excellent ability and promise to go places for John Marshall.

Swimming

Who can resist the sparkling, cool water of a nice, clean pool? The girls are at present having their weekly dip in the pool at the Y. W. C. A., but in a year, (or maybe two) we hope to have a natatorium of our own. The advanced girls swim on Friday night and are taught many fancy stunts. The beginners class goes on Wednesday night; they are taught the first elements of swimming and they also are endeavoring to become great aquatic stars in the future.

Dancing

To be a good dancer is an asset in our present whirl of social life. Here at Marshall, our dancers are well taken care of. Miss VanDe Walle watches over the advanced girls' class one night a week. Miss Davis teaches new steps that are tricky to the boys' and girls' beginning classes.

Volley Ball

A whistle blows—hands clapp—girls cheer—and Miss Foster gives a helpful word of instruction. These are just a few things that go on in Miss Foster's Volley Ball Club. The girls meet every Friday night to have a good fast game of volleyball. Anyone who wishes to join this club is assured of plenty of excitement with plenty of fun.

First Aid

The First Aid Club is a new club this year that has been organized under the direction of Miss VanDe Walle. The girls receive many helpful hints about first aid and are taught all the principles that are concerned with it.

Preparedness Versus Pacifism

PRIZE ESSAY

Two cures have been proposed for the major ailment of the human race today, that fateful attitude of belligerence which has flared ominously more than once since hostilities began in Africa. These cures are preparedness and pacifism.

When such ideas are advanced, they are done so by factions who are looking at the situation from two entirely different angles. They are both advanced with a single aim in mind, to prevent a future war. Both have their advantages and both their disadvantages. In this case, however, I think the advocates of preparedness have presented a plan that will appeal more strongly to the more practical members of society.

The great fault of pacifism, total disarmament, is that the countries of the world will not agree to this step. If such a state of disarmament could be achieved it would undoubtedly represent a marked movement forward toward a more humanitarian existence. Countries are steeped in the brew of nationalistic fervor. They derive great pride from the knowledge that their armies and their navies are the largest or the most efficient in the world. They are also becoming more and more wary of their neighbors' moves. Diplomatic labyrinths create an international bewilderment that befuddles the common citizen. In a sense, the ordinary layman is totally unaware of the manner in which his country's foreign relations are conducted. This state of affairs, of course, stirs up a feeling of distrust among the domestic populace. Therefore, a state of complete disarmament seems very remote.

Preparedness, the other solution, commands the support of the more conservative citizens. It not only serves as a measure of prevention against war, but also presents a field where the people's patriotism can express itself. Unless a nation is provoked by commercial, financial, or political aggression to the point where it will fight, no matter what the odds, it will not engage in battle with an adversary of the same strength.

Money, as represented by taxes, is not wasted if it is used for sane preparedness. No level-minded person would support mass mobilization by a power-crazed dictator. Yet he would be very apt to support a systematic, efficient improvement of his country's national defense when it is conducted according to the fundamental principles of democracy.

War, of course, is one of the greatest scourges that has ever flayed the surface of the earth. Anything that seems to have a good chance of stopping such an evil should be advocated by the thinking public. Preparedness, within certain boundaries, comes the nearest to being a solution for this problem. It will prevent arrogant foreign aggression and will create a feeling of respect among the nations that will effectively dampen any hasty, imperialistic, or vengeful call to arms.

The Meaning of Music

Man since primitive times has always had music with him, this music causing him to divest himself of all worldly affinities. Actually this ethereal thing causes even the crudest boor to weep, sing, dance or to drop off into a reverie of pleasant anticipation. Why is it I wonder that so mechanical a thing as a line with a dot at one end can have so profound an effect upon the emotions?

Mortal life as we become acquainted with it in experience, unshaped by any philosophic or artistic activity, is complex, confused, and irrational. In such a world as we come to know, it must often be that success can bear as sour fruit as failure, and happiness be as caustic as misery. "When all is accidental how can ought be significant?" When all that we have prayed, hoped, and fought for is defenseless against not evil but the onslaught of absurdity in ourselves as well as others, how can you possibly expect to live with dignity and hope?

Nevertheless men have, in various ways, fought against this chaos and all it engenders. The moral man with his laws—flaccid though they may be—the philosopher with his philosophic laws, the Christian with his faith—each of these three fights it his own way and each does the job efficiently.

Unfortunately, each of these ideals dwell on a far higher plane than anyone can reach consistently. The moral man knows the obb of his powers and of temptation; the Christian knows doubt, and the philosopher sometimes uncovers laws which will not fit into his conception.

It is at just these moments that the true worth of Art is known, for Art was erected by man for his solace. It was made to fit the man, hence the man fits it. Music in one respect stands farther afield than any of its companion arts. Painting, sculpture and even literature, are too obstinate to the will of the artist. Everyone knows that no artist ever paints a landscape as it really is; literature itself suffers in this respect because it too encompasses ugly aspects. Music, however, is guided by no law other than those in the medium itself and the musicians' sense of the aesthetic.

Music does not charm us by suggestion nor does it paint or describe, or suggest beauty, but is beauty itself.

It is not as brilliant as the sun nor does it equal the rare beauty of the sunset; it only represents unity in variety and order in chaos. It secures the unity by discarding all that is diverse like the painter who omits a tree because it does not balance. Music then is an oasis in a desert of doubt and chaos.

Music's only criterion is the law of order. The listener should, if music is to justify itself, come away with the feeling that, after all, there is order in a disorderly world. That is the criterion of music.

Fiction on the Street-Car

Did you ever realize that the most boring street-car ride could actually be made delightful and intensely interesting? Instead of gazing disconsolately out of the window, try studying the passengers around you; it's fun to make up stories about who they are and what they do. Of course, it sounds inane, absurd, but it is really a wonderful pastime. The man sitting next to you might be an ex-convict or a burglar. Who knows? "What a silly idea!" you say. Without doubt it is silly, but still, it's entertaining.

Some people have many more possibilities in a story than others. Just yesterday on the street-car I made up five different stories about the man sitting opposite me; by that time I was one block from home.

Usually, however, I muse on several different people while riding on the car. My thoughts wander, carrying me into semi-oblivion. I glance at the attractive girl sitting across from me—how charming she looks! She is probably somebody's secretary—but then, she might be a movie star incognito!

That man so diligently reading across the aisle looks like a typical mathematician, rather short and of medium build with a stolid immobile face.

Then there is the girl sitting next to him, so violently chewing her gum—she has on a red coat with a dingy little green hat, and her face is one of amiable good-nature.

Many adventures could be thought up about the boy at her right. He is burly and rather stout with a generous sprinkling of freckles on his slightly dirty face. His "pug-nose" and bold blue eyes tend to make his face especially fascinating.

An extremely nervous man at the end of the car keeps pulling out his watch every few minutes and glimpsing at it with what appears to be alarm. As I glance at him I think of the "hen-pecked" husband whose wife told him to be home "at six sharp."

The man next to me has fallen asleep. How perfectly stupid to fall asleep on a street-car, I think. But then my sympathy comes to light and I remember that the man is probably "dead-tired" from working so hard at the office.

A tough-looking man up in front is sitting with an equally tough-looking little boy. His loud harsh voice can easily be heard above the din of the street-car. "The only time you're happy's when somebody's given ya somethin'!" He scowls at the boy who looks back at him with an impudent stare.

A seemingly dignified man is eagerly devouring the "Readers Digest." His hair is pure white above a pair of calm level gray eyes. His intelligent face is surmounted by a neat appearance and quiet manner. Perhaps he is a college professor or maybe a doctor.

A large stocky woman is doing her best to quiet the two boisterous children next to her. Her face is serene and calm in spite of its rugged wrinkled appearance. Her clothes are shabby and worn and there are no gloves on her prominently-veined hands. One can tell that she has endured many hardships, but her expression is contented and happy.

I smile as I watch the little girl next to the "make-believe" professor. She is wearing a bright red playsuit, and a red helmet almost hides her curly light-brown hair. Plaid mittens cover her tiny hands, which hold a beautiful china doll. As she looks at the doll, genuine admiration is revealed by her twinkling brown eyes and she hugs it more closely, as if fearful that it will be snatched from her.

A different story presents itself with each of these characters, making my ride home an interesting adventure. Nearing my destination I ring the bell and walk quickly to the front of the car. (Fate has joined us and as easily does the separating, but I at least have not let them pass unnoticed.)

Music or Jazz?

With cymbals clashing, chords came smashing
Thundrous octaves, roaring bass
Drummers pounding, strings resounding
In a wild and frenzied race.

I was thrilled, I must confess,
To hear that music clear.
But I am young, and I'd like best
To have the strains come to my ear.

Of trumpets blaring jubilation,
Crooners, crooning sentiment,
Saxes moaning syncopation,
In a sobbing sad lament.

On Clouds

Like fresh bleached cotton blown into a feathering spume,
Drifting by a background of blue,
Or the shimmering rays of the moon;
Proudly reflecting your albus tint
From out earth's natural mirror,
Now smudged by smoke,
Now feign to choke,
Till the breeze shall waft the purer.
It's a queer sight when thou field of white—
Blanket the starlit sky,
While the winds play pranks with thy hazy banks—

As the earth goes drifting by,
And often thy sisters are swept, and swept,
Like a new rake curries the sod;
And I gaze amazed at thy luminous haze—
What else, but the handiwork of God?

CHARLES NELSON

FATE'S WAY

PRIZE STORY

The girl held her breath and shrank further back into the darkness. The men passed so near that she could have reached out her hand and touched them. Three men, with coat collars turned up and hats well down over their eyes; three men, abreast, walking rapidly, with long, quick strides; three pairs of steely eyes, searching—trying to see through the thick London fog—they were gone! The girl breathed more easily. She stepped from the doorway whose protecting blackness had hidden her from those searching eyes. She blessed the heavy fog and hurried down the alley in the opposite direction from that taken by the three men. Hurry, hurry, her brain repeated again and again—hurry!

With a quick backward glance, she descended a stairway, picking her way cautiously. Reaching the bottom, she put her hand out for the doorknob which she knew she would find there. She turned it slowly and prayed that it would not resist her. The door opened easily, and she quickly stepped over the sill, closing the door softly behind her. It was pitch black. She stood for a moment, listening—any minute they might return—if they should find her here—voluntarily she shuddered.

She pulled a flashlight from her pocket and took a few steps forward, snapping on the light, and shooting its beams into the far corners. The room was a good-sized one; luckily it had no windows and her flash could not be seen from the alleyway. Against one wall was a table, and grouped around it were three chairs. On the table stood a small kerosene lamp. The light came to rest upon a large safe in the corner, and with a little cry of satisfaction she stepped across the room and knelt before the safe. Drawing a slip of paper from an inner pocket, she scanned it hurriedly and began turning the dial—26 left—14 right—32 right—5 left—and back to 26 left—ah—a click—she had it! With pounding heart she swung back the heavy door, her eye lighting on a bundle of papers as she did so. Suddenly, her heart stood still—footsteps on the stairs. She closed the safe door swiftly and, jumping up, sprang back against the wall. The door opened immediately, and the three men walked in, the last closing the door behind him.

"Say, didn't you hear something when I opened this door?" asked one of the men.

"Turn on the lamp," commanded a second voice.

Two of them stood by the door while the third crossed quickly to the table and, striking a match, lit the lamp. Shadows sprang into reality, and the men glancing quickly about the room sighed with relief as only familiar objects greeted their eyes.

"I'd swear I heard something," said the shortest of the three, peering into the corners.

"Well, there's nothing here," answered the man who had lit the lamp. "Probably only a rat—the place is lousy with them."

The third man had already seated himself at the table and was busy lighting a cigarette. He now spoke for the first time, in a low drawing voice, "Too bad the girl got away—that damn fog—" He inhaled deeply and pushed his hat back from his forehead.

"Yeah," sneered the short man, "If Burke had locked that door like I told him—"

"Trying to put the blame on me, eh Shantz?" broke in Burke threateningly.

"Shut up, you fools! Nothing you can do about it, now," reprimanded the man with the cigarette. "Now, listen to me." He flicked the ashes from his cigarette and puffed on it again before continuing. The diamond on his left hand flashed.

Meanwhile, the object of their discussion having sprung against the wall was astounded to find it giving away beneath her weight. With an exclamation, she fell backward into a passageway, and the unseen door sprang shut just as the three men entered the room. She sat quietly where she had fallen, trying to collect her wits. Luck was evidently with her tonight. Twice now she had been on the brink of disaster, only to be snatched away just as she was about to topple over. She got cautiously to her feet and felt about her. She was in a narrow passageway about three feet wide—she could feel a draft behind her. Turning, she started forward, feeling on each side of her as she walked. She had traversed about ten feet when a cold moist breeze blew across her face. Water! The Thames! With eager step she advanced, and finally found herself on the waterfront. She stood for a moment congratulating herself on her fortunate escape. Then, turning to her left, she walked resolutely along the dock.

It was late in the afternoon of the next day. Inspector Goodman of Scotland Yard jammed a cigar into his mouth and chewed at it viciously. He leaned back in his swivel chair and glared affectionately at the young woman before him.

"Montel, you'll get into a mixup some time and you won't find it so easy to get away. How many times have I told you not to take unnecessary risks. Lord, woman! I don't know how you get away with it. It's just sheer luck—but I've got to hand it to you—you always get what you go after. When you blew in here at midnight with that evidence—whe! Well, we've got the three of them safe and sound, under lock and key."

Sharyn Montel smiled wistfully, displaying a pair of fascinating dimples. She thrust her hands into her pockets and shrugged. "Sometimes I wonder about my good luck myself, inspector," she said; "And just to make sure I won't get into any of those mixups you were warning me about, I'm quitting. I'm getting married."

Goodman's jaw dropped and he leaned forward. "No!" he almost whispered.

Sharyn sat down wearily, and crossed her legs. "You're gonna lose your prize detective, inspector."

"Well, I'm sorry to hear it, Sharyn—you're leaving us, I mean,—but, well, congratulations —" He stood up awkwardly and extended a hand. The girl grasped it, a cynical smile playing about her lips.

"Thanks, chief. Can you guess who the groom is?"

Inspector Goodman shook his head, shifting the cigar to the other side of his mouth.

She got up and walked to the door. With her hand on the knob, she turned and faced him.

"You've got your evidence, inspector," she said, pointing to the bundle of papers on his desk, "and it will convict the man I'm going to marry, tonight. You gave me the job, and I did it, and now I'm going to marry the worst man in London—murderer, thief, counterfeiter —" She gave a miserable little laugh.

"I didn't know that, though, when I promised to marry him, and he never knew that I was connected with Scotland Yard—Oh, I'll admit I would have thrown that pile of papers into the Thames if I'd known it would sign the death warrant of the man I loved. But I didn't know—God—!" She opened the door and slipped out just as the inspector reached her side.

"Sharyn, no, you can't—"

But Sharyn was gone. Two hours later she married the man whose criminal record had shocked all of London, the man who had damned the fog the night before.

Memories

For many things we cry,
But most, I think, for days gone by.
For never can we capture more
The raptures we enjoyed of yore.

The sorrows too, but these grow dim
And we forget all things so grim
It is the joys we sorrow for
And magnify a little more.

Past pleasures now so lovely loom,
Dispensing all existing gloom.
Our eyes grow dim, we vaguely smile
Joys we thought dead live yet awhile.

DOROTHY LESTER

THE SUMMONS

Raging waves roared their challenge at the rocky ramparts of the bleak English coast. The sea, azure and tranquil during the short fall day, had changed into a ravaging monster, sinister, omnipotent, now that the shades of darkness had smothered the daytime radiance of the sun. Slanting lines of rain, driven seaward by a sweeping wind, beat against the strongly mortared stones of an ancient castle, squatting doglike upon the eyrie summit of the sea cliff. No movement presented evidence of any human occupation of the structure. The castle, immobile, seemed to sleep. One thing, however, gave the lie to that supposition. Out of a narrow window, high in the imposing bulk of masonry, danced a light, flickering out against the forces of darkness, ambushed just without the casement.

Beyond the lighted window, a room presented a scene of barbaric asceticism. Dry and withered rushes thinly covered the rock-lined floor. Suits of mail, rusty now with long disuse, clumsy shields, scarred by the ravages of many northland battles, hung sagging from the walls. At the heavy wooden table, lighted by the feeble glow of a candle, sat a huge figure of a man, his shaggy head resting upon his crossed forearms. The candle's light cast grotesque, fanciful shadows over the man's crimson tunic, crossed by a leather baldric. Suddenly, as if disturbed by some sound outside, he raised his massive head, "Who's there?" he cried. "Cedric, is that you?"

Nothing answered. Silence continued to reign. The man, not satisfied, rose and padded softly to the iron-hinged door, listened intently a moment, then flung the door wide. The musty stale smell of the hall swept into the room. The silence was oppressive.

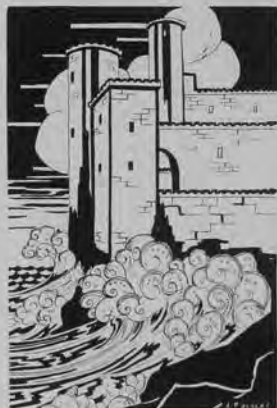

"Great God, he murmured to himself, "how long can this last?"

He slowly crossed the room to the table, sank on the bench, resumed his former pose. The dull boom of the sea sounded up from the watery wastes which rolled up avalanches against the cliff's base below.

Again the man raised his head. This time there was no purpose in his gaze. His eyeballs were dilated. The blood had mounted to his cheeks, flushed and red as if consumed by a fever. All of a sudden, his jaws fell open and from the open mouth came forth a hollow, mirthless cackle; the mad, gibbering laugh of a madman.

It was a morning in May, 1260. The bright sunshine outside was in direct contrast to the pall of sorrow that overhung the feudal estate of Magnum. That morning, weakened by a sickness that had laid him low for nearly a year, John Magnum, stern, implacable, had faded away to his last rest in that mystic realm where fighting men have gone, down through the ages. By his bedside had stood his sons, Cedric, dark and slim with the head of a poet; Alfred, a burly uncouth figure of a man with long, ape-like arms. They were a strange pair, these two. Held together by some faint sense of kinship, they had quarreled, and strained at the leash of parental authority for years, always hostile, jealous, surly. They eyed each other over their father's body, silent, like two wolves motionlessly awaiting the other's first move.

It was inevitable that such a state of affairs should produce a showdown. This climax came with a tragic, fatal swiftness that left the neighboring barons stunned.

The brothers were seated in the long hall of the manor. The doors of the room were flung open to catch the pungent freshness of an English night in spring. Outside, the heather's rustle murmured moodily under the arching sky. The hum of insects came up from the marshes, strong, now, as it wafted on a rushing wind current, now whispering away to silence as the wind died down.

Cedric abruptly stood up to bend over a roll of parchment on the table. One end of the paper was held down by a weight, while his slim, tapering fingers slowly unrolled the rest of the crackling cylinder. His white, high, forehead was creased with an intent frown, his long, dank hair fell tumbled to his narrow shoulders.

"Alfred," he suddenly exclaimed, "this paper has been changed. Our father promised me the land across the river. This paper says that you are to have it. Do you know aught of this?"

"Nay," growled his brother. "A mistake of the scribe, no doubt. Does it make any difference to you as long as the land is equally divided?"

"Yes," passionately cried Cedric, his dark eyes flashing, "and well you know it. Everything I love about this place is across that river—that piece of wood, the trout brook, and the old abbey. On this side is the manor. It is yours. I will have no part in it. But I must have that land."

"Hold your tongue, boy! The manor may be on this side but where are the most fertile fields? You claim to love the woods and brooks but all the time you are thinking of the difference in the harvest of the fields. You are the younger and have no right to demand that land. It is mine. And yes, how could a weakling like you hope to defend it against Anewulf. All the time he tries to take it away, now by stealth, now by force."

"You dare to call me a weakling? Take it back before I cut out your tongue!"

With a strangled cry, Cedric tumbled at his belt, drew a long knife, and strode toward Alfred. Quickly, easily, surprisingly so, for a man of his weight, Alfred rose, his hand groping for a rusty battle-axe, suspended on a peg from the wall.

Madly, unseeingly, Cedric rushed, the long blade of the knife gleaming wickedly. Alfred side-stepped, swung up the axe, and as Cedric plunged blindly by, let the curved head of the axe fall down in a glittering arc, sinking deep into his brother's skull. As the body sagged drunkenly to the floor, Alfred's tense arms relaxed, fell limply to his side, the axe falling clatteringly at his feet. For a moment he stood there, motionless, his head lowered. Then slowly he turned away to sink into his chair.

The days passed. The rough customs of the country brooked no interference in family affairs. Alfred was unpunished by alien hands. But at this point there sprung up in the breast of Alfred Magnum a complex question. Bitter enmity had been the keynote of the brothers' relations, but now a surge of tardy penitence overwhelmed the remaining brother. In identical circumstances a man can do two things: lose himself in a riot of gavety and fast living or else draw away from all caustic contacts with the outside world into cloistered solitude. Alfred chose the latter course, sold his holdings, purchased a lonely castle, shut himself up, and thus sold himself into lunacy.

The ghoulish mirth of the madman echoed back from the cold walls. The man heaved himself up, stepped to the window, threw back the blinds, and gazed into the damp murk. He had the air of a man who was listening. "Cedric, is that you?" he called. The low roar of the pounding surf mocked his calling which was swept away by the tempestuous gale that plastered his damp locks to his head. Of a sudden he spread his arms wide, stepped forward, a weird gleam lighting up his eyes, stepped forward into nothingness. A wavering shriek burst from his lips, was lost as he plunged downward. Inside the room the candle wavered, went out. Darkness reigned supreme.

Autumn

To see God's works, today we went.
With Mother Nature we have spent

Such splendid blends of reds and greens
Have filled my heart with endless bliss.

"WHEN SUNSET IS DAWN"

Author's Note:—

This short story is supposed to follow the plot of "The Apple Tree." There have been a great many changes in my plot. In "When Sunset is Dawn" there is also the striking of death, but this time death fails to claim its victim. The one thing that is similar in both stories is the way in which the main character reveals his past life with some person through a reminiscence of by-gone days. The happy ending in "When Sunset is Dawn" is another item which differentiates the two stories. I must say that I very humbly apologize to John Galsworthy in my attempt to create a story similar in some shape or manner to his.

B. E.

The dawn, saturated with hues of golden and reddish rays brought forth to the world a new day. It sent a message of cheer and warmth to the people who viewed it, but all this was lost to Dale, who was keeping a vigil over her child throughout the night. She had never been intimate with death before, but now as this fathomed creature was hovering over her daughter, eager to snatch the fluttering breath from the tiny body she was inflicted with all the pain and sorrow that accompany it.

Her husband beside her moved by this crisis was pale, and yet, he was the stronger of the two. He strove to be steady and comforting to his wife.

The door quietly opened and the doctor came in. Bending over his patient, he examined her quickly and skillfully. He arose from his position and said in a subdued tone, "Tony, take Dale to her room and keep her there. There is nothing she can do as the crisis hasn't come, and until that has come and gone, the life of this child is in God's hands." Going over to Tony, the doctor helped him with Dale who was so stricken with sorrow that she offered no resistance.

When the door of her room had been closed, the composure which often sustains people in the face of a great sorrow left Dale. She didn't faint, but there in the seclusion of her husband's arms, she shook with violent sobs. "Give way to tears, dear. Cry. It will help so much," Tony murmured brokenly in her ear. At that Dale's barrier broke down completely and the sobs that came were heart-rending.

"Oh, Tony! Oh, Tony!" Dale sobbed. "Why does it have to be our little girl? The one we love so much? Why, she is our very life."

"I know, I know, Sweet," Tony replied feelingly. Stroking and soothing her head, he carried her over and placed her on the bed.

"Don't leave me now," was her plea.

"I'm not going, dear, I'm staying here with you," was the comforting reply.

When Dale became quiet, she turned to Tony. "Remember, Tony, the first time the three of us were together. Remember how we marveled at the tiny precious life that had been entrusted to our care; how we both vowed that we would be loving, understanding, and kind to her. I can still feel the sacredness of the nights when we would stand by her crib and watch her peacefully sleeping. Remember how sweetly she would smile when she would awake from her nap and stretch out her tiny arms to be taken up. How she would gurgle and coo at you the moment you would come home from work. Oh, Tony, why couldn't we've kept her that way always? Didn't the years pass rapidly with her making each year more wonderful. Remember how sweet she was on her fourth birthday in her pink dress. Can't you just picture how her eyes glowed with wonderment and delight when she saw her birthday cake, and remember when she gladly gave the doll she loved best to the poor girl down the street." Dale talked incessantly, and as she was a healthy woman who had been deprived of sleep for forty-eight hours, she became the victim of this one healing agent. Tony, knowing that she would not awaken for sometime, left her and resumed his place of vigilance by the small babe.

While she was sleeping, a comforting feeling seemed to bathe her whole soul. The words of the doctor's "The life of this child is in God's hands" roused her back to consciousness. Had she really been slack in her thankfulness to God for little Gail. She realized that Gail was not wholly Tony's and her's, but that Someone else had even a greater claim on her. That Someone's will exceeds all earthly power. Dale had at last come upon the one knowledge that some people find and are thankful for, and other people are too busy in their lives to seek it until it's too late. Now, here in her sorrow, Dale felt comforted and truly calm. Rising from her bed she went to the window. Outside, the glowing sun was bidding goodby to the softly shadowed world, but Dale in her heart was just awakening. "Oh, Lord in heaven, let Thy Will be done," was the prayer that fell from her lips.

The door quickly opened and Tony appeared, "Come quick Dale, the crisis is at hand."

Kneeling side by side by the crib, they saw their daughter slowly return from the Valley of the Shadow to life and to love. Her eyes brimming with tears, Dale raised her face to her husband's and whispered, "God is good" to which he noddingly assented.

The Summer's Last Leaf

Rattling as the chill wind,
Whips through its tree,
Shivering as the first frost,
Falls on woods and lea.

Small, and brown, and all alone,
The rest have gone, and left in grief,
That shivering, trembling mate of theirs,
The summer's last leaf.

A cold and swift wind finally comes
And drops the leaf to the snowy floor,
A warm, soft blanket comforts it,
At last its sorrow lives no more.

"And such is life," left all alone,
In misery and in grief,
Until a friend can comfort you,
As the soft snow comforts the leaf.

Surprise Weather

The snow in rushing rivulets
Has gone its melted way;
Mud is on the sidewalk,
Ice is gone from the bay;
Angleworms are deciding
To see the world above;
A robin on a maple
Is singing to his love;
Crocuses are peeping
Through the dead wet leaves;
Water is dripping all the time
Drip, drip, from the eaves;
A new warm smell is in the air;
A new breeze tries its wings;
The world so lovely is a dare
To just burst out and sing;
The sun is shining warmly out
To kiss the buds of the larch;
All nature is making ready for spring;
Too bad—it's March!

PRIZE POEM

I wandered aimless as a cloud
Scanning windows of the shops,
When mirrored there I saw a crowd,
A host of brilliant crimson spots;
Beside my nose, beneath my chin,
Spreading and popping on my chin.

Continuous as the stars that shine
And twinkle in the sky above;
They stretch'd in never-ending line
Along the margin of my glove -
Ten thousand saw I at a glance,
Showing their heads in wicked dance.

The skin beside them blanched, but they
Made sport the pallid skin in glee;
And I was filled with deep dismay,
At such an itchy company,
I gazed—and gazed but little thought
What humiliation measles brought.

And now as on my couch I lie
Alone and in a solemn mood,
They flash upon my inner eye
Which is the bane of solitude;
But then my heart with hope refills,
The while I swallow countless pills.

The Milkman

The wind was a voice of the darkness, among the dusty trees,
The moon was a silvery liner, tossed upon turbulent seas,
The road was a strip of canvas, covering the desert floor,
And the milkman came striding, sliding, riding
The milkman came striding up to the café door.
He'd a light straw hat on his forehead, a bright red tie at his chin,
A shirt of greenish purple and breeches shiny
as tin,
They fitted with always a wrinkle; his shoes
had a creamy tie!
And he strode with a tinny twinkle, his milk
cans a-tinkle
His jewelled belt a-twinkle under the morning sky.

Over the pavement he stumbled and dashed,
into the café door,
And he rapped with his fist on the shutters,
and poured all the milk on the floor.
He caroled a song to the door-post, then fled
as an angry roar.

Our New Home

The person most likely to enjoy and appreciate our beautiful new school is the one who fully realizes what a truly marvelous and completely equipped building this is. An oversupply of notes and explanations might prove monotonous; consequently, our aim is to illustrate in this section, some of the most interesting and picturesque parts of our home.

As a means for furthering physical education, the new John Marshall has been provided with two fully equipped gymnasiums and a natatorium. There is a small and large gymnasium. In the larger one, which is seventy feet wide by ninety feet long, all the home basketball games will be played. To accommodate spectators a balcony with a seating capacity of approximately eight hundred places on either side of the court will be used.

As necessary apparatus two parallel bars, two horizontal bars, two side horses, two bucks, and sufficient mats for tumbling are being provided. This apparatus is to be used by the Individual Health Classes as well as the gym classes. Because of the tardy beginning of gym work, the apparatus will probably not be in use until the term beginning January, 1936.

Marshall is inaugurating a new system. A gym suit, a towel, and a lock are furnished for a fee of twenty-five cents per term. Although the suits may be kept in the lockers after gym class, they will be called in from time to time during the term to be laundered in the school laundry. The boys' gym suits will consist of cream shirts and khaki trunks, while the girls will have green ones.

An added feature in the physical educational department of the new school are the showers. They are regulated by a central control that has a thermometer indicating the temperature of the water. The central control has three valves, each of which control a certain number of showers.

In the boys' shower room there are eighty-four showers and in the girls' shower room there are sixty-two, that are suspended overhead. Beyond a door at one end of the shower room is a drying room. The girls' locker room has the added feature of a locker within a dressing room and electric hair dryers.

The natatorium which is still under construction is expected to be completed in February, but it will not be open for use until other pools in the city schools are re-opened. As a government grant of money made possible the construction of a swimming pool, the Board of Education authorized the immediate construction of the pool at John Marshall. The present seniors will not benefit from the new pool unless they take a post graduate course.

Lights under the water on both sides of the pool will light up the bottom of the pool. Purification of the water will be accomplished by the application of the ultra-violet ray system. Below the water an inlet pipe will keep fresh running water in the pool continually.

One of the most modern and most adequately equipped of the classrooms in the new building is the art room. It has an ideal location for this purpose.

The numerous windows throw plenty of light on the subject. On dull days when natural light is inadequate the electric lights, designed especially for art rooms, are used. The individual drawing tables and the attached chairs may be moved about the room and adjusted to any height. These number among the newest and best equipment to be obtained for use in art rooms.

There is a room devoted entirely to commercial art. This room is located off the back of the main art room. It has a large drawing table at which several persons may work. The furniture used in this room is that to be found in the world of commercial art. There is a store room furnishing ample space to store all unused supplies. In the main room are cabinets in which the material in use may be kept over-night. Each student has a compartment where he may keep his material while he is not working. There are special cases that have glass doors. Here all pieces of unusual talent may be placed on exhibition.

As our tour of the art rooms is completed, we lament the fact that we are untalented in that field and cannot take advantage of the new facilities. We used to consider it a pleasure to take art, but here in the new school, it is not only a pleasure but a privilege.

It is much more fun learning to be a housewife these days than previously, we are all sure of that; two new attractive rooms, fully equipped with the latest implements can prove it.

Under the able guidance of Miss Pashley, things have been running smoothly and pleasantly in the Sewing Division.

There is a new system by which each member has her own drawer in a cupboard which can be removed to a space at her work table, thus gaining efficiency, neatness, and comfort. Garments are approaching the donning stage.

In the Foods Department a soft hum reports both pleasantness and busy pupils. The space has been cleverly divided into eight modern convenient kitchens, with plenty of room remaining for the maple table sets, a desk, and other storage space. Steady progress has been gained this term, while the four girls in each kitchen are learning to become independent, making their own meals, following individual directions with only an occasional appearance of Miss Schamel to check up on results. Several things have been learned successfully so far, cleanliness, neatness, routine efficiency and simple but tasty methods of disguising ordinary, everyday food.

The most interesting section of our new school is that which comprises the Art Craft rooms. As you know, they are situated in the basement, yet the splendid lighting facilities make it possible to work with the finest materials. Everything has been done for the convenience of the students. We know the equipment to be the most modern in the city.

There are two adjoining craft shops, one of them containing a "dark room" for the use of those students who are interested in photography. All machines are electric, such as the power drill press, jig saw, and variety saw.

The most remarkable improvement has been made in the installation of the most up-to-date wood and machine lathes. In the old school, the models used had complicated grill-work and belts extended over-head. In the models used now, the motors and belts have been inclosed in a box-like compartment underneath the machine. This is not only a great improvement in looks, but also in safety.

Students turn out excellent work in wood, wrought iron, metals, leather, and pottery. Art-Craft is a field thoroughly enjoyed by girls as well as boys.

Our new school boasts many splendors in its entirety, not the least among these being the lunchroom. Though it is not so luxurious or decorative as some, yet its cleanliness, spaciousness, and efficiency are fully appreciated by all.

The new kitchen is far superior to the old in its convenient modern appliances: two improved ranges and a baking oven which is especially handy for making rolls; a large refrigerator built to order (the old one was apt to be temperamental); a potato steamer in which all vegetables keep their shape, color and flavor; a potato peeler which gains in time and economy. In addition there is a special dish-washing room and a much larger store-room for canned goods and vegetables. This larger establishment employs nine part-time workers where formerly only four were needed. In short, "The whole system is 100% better," according to Miss Andrews, chief dietitian.

Many more students buy their whole lunch than formerly and benefit by the lovely new china and silverware. The food counter is much more attractively and systematically arranged with edibles placed in the order desired, a section cooled by refrigeration, and another panel warmed by steam heat.

Forty-nine new tables have been added which have doubled the seating arrangement so it is no longer necessary to rush for a seat.

The honor patrol is busy in the lunchroom daily as well as in the corridors. Here twelve to fourteen girls, attractively clad in blue smocks aid in keeping order and boosting Marshall patriotism.

In our lovely new school there are two especially beautiful rooms—the auditorium and the library. The library with its quartered oak paneling and recessed windows is typically Colonial. Though it is not much larger than the old library, it is much more convenient for both the students and the librarians. It also has many built-in features such as the inclined shelves for showing books, the magazine racks, and the leaded glass cases for the special books we hope to have soon.

Our school is the only one in the city which has a special book stand behind the desk. This holds approximately two hundred reserved books and saves time in finding a much used edition. Built-in bookshelves line the walls and are placed between the wide windows under which are the enclosed radiators and air-conditioning vents. There is a new filing case for clippings and a roomy library desk (Miss Grinnell never had one before.)

The cork floor absorbs noise, while the creamy globes with black tassels provide plenty of light on dark days. The library will hold about 10,000 books. We have been given $250 worth of new books and expect to have more soon.

At one end of the library are doors leading to two small rooms. One of these is used to file old magazines and for conference, while the other is the workroom.

 "A thing of beauty is a joy forever." These words of Keats' will linger in our memories and we will never forget the beauty of the auditorium, in this, our new school.

The building itself is the Georgian type of Colonial architecture; naturally this motif is carried out in the assembly hall. The first thing to greet our eyes as we enter the auditorium is the stage. The soft gracefulness of the green velvet draperies seems enhanced by the most modern foot-lights. Matching draperies hang at the windows. These blend softly with the white wooden pillars gracing the side walls. The stage curtains are drawn aside and lo! and behold, a mammoth movie screen is before our eyes. The make-up and dressing rooms are to be found back-stage.

The orchestra pit is sunk about three feet below the floor of the hall and is fenced in by a wrought iron railing. The main floor is on a slant and the seats are so placed that it is no longer necessary to peer around the ears of the person in front of you. The hall will seat about 1,442 students and only one to a seat. Each homeroom has a section reserved for them even to the freshmen and eighth graders, who have the balcony all to themselves.

As our eyes scan the balcony we see the clock. It is nothing like the "Big Ben" affairs that are in the classrooms. It is set right into the wall and only the hands project from the graceful curving base of the balcony.

Our thankful gaze goes heavenward and as we admire the pattern of the panel in the ceiling our eyes detect the little ventilation boxes that are almost hidden in the carved border of the panel.

Last, but by no means least, the projection room appears; and we wonder what it seems like to be on the other side looking at such majestic beauty through the tiny box-like holes in the wall. It is behind these little holes that the artist who maneuvers the colored lights does his work.

Suddenly it dawns upon us that we must soon drag our weary selves through one of the six exits out into that all too real world of classrooms.

STEPPING STONES

When spaced stepping stones mark the way across the stream of Preparation to the land of Business Careers, it is best to take each step rather than to leap—and possibly miss.

Which, being translated, means: High School then R.B.I., then a position in business. That's better than jumping right for a job and losing out through lack of a drill in business fundamentals and practice.
