THE JANUARY AND JUNE CLASSES
JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL
ROCHESTER, NEW YORK

---

F o r e w o r d

Vikings—call up pictures of sturdy and dauntless men forever seeking and finding adventure. In true Homeric fashion they sailed uncharted seas with unfailing courage. May this voyage on which you are to embark be rich in glorious adventure too—Your four years of high school have been the compass to guide you to happy ports and friendly places. In your search for knowledge and the best that life has to offer, with true Viking spirit, may you strive "to seek, to find, but not to yield."

ELMER W. SNYDER

D e d i c a t i o n

To the memory of the man for whom our school is named the classes of January and June 1937 dedicate this book with the hope that our future decisions throughout life will be based on the same sound principles that he advocated.

ELMER W. SNYDER

Words are a poor conveyance of our deep esteem for Mr. Snyder. From our entrance into the old film factory to our palatial surroundings of today his thoughtfulness and sympathy have made our high school life a very enjoyable and momentous occasion.

Instruction in and knowledge of the truths of life are indispensable to clear thought, prudent leadership, and right living

Our Advisers

Mrs. Caro F. Spencer
Mr. C. Willard Burt

Mrs. Florence Toolan
Mr. Fred Myers

We wish to express our profound appreciation to our advisers, Mrs. Caro F. Spencer and Mr. C. Willard Burt, for their unfailing interest and guidance throughout our high school careers. It is through their incessant efforts that our problems, insignificant or important as they may have seemed, have reached a successful termination. To our class club advisers, Mrs. Florence Toolan and Mr. Fred Myers, we also give our thanks. Through their wide understanding, our senior clubs have not only proved an invaluable source of knowledge in preparing us for the great future but also one of much enjoyment.

DAVID SEDERQUIST . . . President
ANNE BOHACKET . . . Vice-President
BETTY BECKER . . . . . Secretary
EDWARD WEGMAN . . . Cheerleader

The honor and responsibility of being an officer of the Student Association is bestowed upon some of the foremost students at election every term. These officers represent John Marshall High School. Often the president or vice-president is called upon to speak, be present, or give greetings at many functions at which the Rochester high schools are represented, as well as in other high school assemblies.

National Honor Society

To be elected to the National Honor Society is the greatest honor which can be bestowed upon a high school student. Pupils in the upper quarter of their class in scholarship are voted upon by members of the Society and teachers, on a basis of character, leadership, and service to the school. This is a goal for which every high school student should aim.

Forum and Cabinet

The Forum is the legislative body having a representative from each homeroom, and the Cabinet is the executive board that controls all student activities and is chosen from among the members of the Forum and student body. Any pupil who has ideas regarding activities or changes in organization informs his representative who in turn places the matter before this group to decide its fate. Mr. Wishart, as adviser, is present at the meetings.

Student Secretaries

Many girls have taken advantage of the opportunity afforded them in experiencing office practice under the department heads. Only a capable commercial student may apply for this position. They earn credits toward an activity award for their service, but the outstanding feature is the actual valuable experience in all fields of office work which these people acquire.

There are many departments and individual teachers who would be at a considerable loss without the aid of these people who have received valuable instruction in the Business Education Department under Mr. Brady.

John Quill Staff

The John Quill Staff composes the senior annual which contains a four year history of the studies, clubs, and other activities in which the seniors have taken part during their high school career.

Two important sections of the publication are the one containing individual portraits of all the graduates and a very fine literary section.

Members of the graduating classes compile the book with the assistance of faculty advisers. The works of artistic or literary nature are contributed by students of the school.

Members of the Visual Aid, who are operators of Kodascopes, opaque projectors and lantern slide machines are in charge of films and slides that are shown in classes.

Radio Aids know how to operate the radio control board and tune in on radio broadcasts which are sent directly to the rooms of those teachers who request them.

Mr. Evald and Mr. Myers instruct and help the pupils in carrying out these duties.

Soccer Team

With a team weakened considerably by graduation, Coach Gerace has developed a squad of booters that has repeatedly shown the real Marshall fight. Several injuries to the players slowed the team up at times, but they never stopped fighting, and were always game until the final whistle had blown. Captain "Reggie" Clegg played an outstanding game on the line, and Dave Allardice also starred at goal. Both boys received berths on the Interscholastic second team.

Handball

Handball is in full swing. When these teams go into action, a fast, smooth game of handball can be seen in any portion of the gym, provided their zig-zagging bodies don't make you dizzy.

The ready and smiling response of our boys shows that this wonderful body building game is taking hold in Marshall.

Bowling and Cheerleaders

From Left: Charles Kingsley, Edwin Fox, Edward Wegman, Bert De Visser

Each Tuesday night, this group of bowlers represents Marshall in the Scholastic Bowling League. As we go to press the team is occupying fourth place, but we feel confident that Mervin Demler, their captain, will see them to a higher berth. The members of our bowling team are all topnotchers.

Each term, a cheerleader is elected, bestowed with the power of picking a squad of cheerleaders and organizing a pep squad. Ed Wegman was elected this term, and is shown swinging into action.

Baseball

Dame fortune seemed to turn her deaf ear to rumors that Marshall's veteran ball team was going places. After getting off to a bad start during which most of the breaks went to othe other teams, our ball-shaggers luck turned, and they played heads up ball for the remainder of the season. The team, captained by Paul Crego, finished in fifth place. Although Mr. Ulrich's team has been handicapped because they have no home field, he feels that the fine spirit of the team will see them through another good season until our new field is ready.

Schedule

Other Sports

Basketball

What sport does everyone think about when this time of year rolls around? Why, of course, it's basketball. Our team that is in the process of organization as we go to press will soon be in the midst of a hard season. Certainly, with the new bleachers in the gym, we students should not find it hard to enjoy supporting our sharpshooters.

We can always be sure that Mr. Makin will produce a fast, spirited team that will provide Marshallites with many thrills in the course of a game.

Track

Last spring, Mr. Makin's track team seemed to be in the same predicament as the baseball team. During the first competition, the team of seasoned veterans met a jinx, lost the meet, and thus faded the hopes of a championship. After this unexpected set back, the boys "found" themselves, and ran splendidly for the remainder of the season.

Tennis

Tennis is one of the finest games a fellow can play, and is one of the sports that most athletes continue to play after they leave school. Marshall's tennis team is supervised by Mr. Ulrich, who saw them through a highly successful competitive season as they finished in second place in the Scholastic Tennis League. Six sterling players constituted the team. They are as follows: Stanley Marshall, John Cronk, George Dixon, Edward Mahar, Kenneth Marriott, and Mervin Demler.

Golf

Golf is another sport that is played extensively by athletes after they finish school. They realize the advantages the game has physically; giving complete exercise but not necessarily fatigue. Golf has recently been brought back to Marshall after a lapse of a few years, and results have been very satisfactory. The members of last year's team are: Richard Deane, Lee Pero, Robert Puffer, and Jack Baybutt.

Riding Club

Originally the Riding Club was on Saturdays only; now, because of the increase in membership, the class has been divided and is held on Wednesdays and Saturdays. Many of the girls have become such expert riders that they have participated in outside horse shows and carried home ribbons to show to Mrs. Lay, their leader.

Dancing

If you girls want to be popular, learn to dance! This opportunity is extended to you through two after school classes held in the small gym. One of these classes, for beginners, on Thursdays and the other, for the more professional, on Wednesdays. Those who try to teach you not to step on your partner's toes are Miss Van De Walle and Miss Davis.

Bowling

An old form of entertainment, yet an interesting and valuable one, is bowling. The girls have much fun competing with each other to secure the highest final score. This has proved a rare way to reduce, so why not come out for this sport, girls? This sport is under Miss Van De Walle's supervision.

Hiking

Weary bones are always felt on Wednesday nights by the girls who belong to the Hiking Club. In their wanderings, unknown fields and roads are explored to their heart's content. Even though the grass may be wet the hikers trudge merrily on their way, and Miss Foster, their supervisor, trudges with them.

Girls' Life Saving

These girls, the "Life Savers" of our school, are endeavoring to become expert swimmers in order to enjoy the sport themselves and to lend a helping hand in time of an emergency. Any girl who wishes to become a swimmer is able to do so by participating in either of two classes, beginners on Monday or advanced on Thursday.

The Tragedy of The Oysterman

Theme by Oliver Wendell Holmes

Adapted by Betty Becker in the manner of William Shakespeare

Dramatis Personae

EPITHEUS: the lover, an oysterman

VERONICA: the other lover

MORTAGUE: a fisherman, father of Veronica

RIVER:

MORISES: the friend of Epitheus

ACT ONE—SCENE ONE

As the curtain rises upon our play, which knows no time, we find ourselves facing a most peculiar setting. On either side of the stage we see a sign on which is printed "Shore" in large letters. Veronica, simply garbed in a dress of the time of Shakespeare, sits on a rock on the left shore. Every now and then she gazes wistfully across the river at Epitheus, who, similarly dressed, sits on the right shore. He pays no attention to her, however, but gazes off into space. At the rear center of the stage and directly in front of a strip of wavy blue paper, stands River, personified. He is draped with a greenish blue cloth deeply fringed at the ends. Throughout the play, River sways slowly to and fro. We now break in upon the bachelor's reveries as he says:

EPITHEUS:

Ah, a lonely oysterman am I,
Alas and a-lack-a-day I sigh.
I've none but my oysters and my hut
on the rock,
Yet, ever my oysters console me not.
But hark! Who comes?
My aged friend Morises.
What tidings?

(Morises, a bent old man, enters from the right and speaks.)

MORISES:

Ah, young friend, hast noticed not
The fair young maiden on yonder rock?
Would that I were a youth like you
Then would I the fair one woo.
But, dear friend, your youth have you,
And handsome of face I'd say.
Go to her now, make haste away.

(Throughout this conversation between Epitheus and Morises, Veronica glances coquetishly towards the two. Morises returns these glances with a smile and nod of the head.)

EPITHEUS:

Aye, yet knowest thou not who 'tis?
The only daughter of Mortgage she is.
He holds his daughter well.
Were I to woo her to seek my heaven,
Would he cast me down to HELL!

MORISES:

Shame! What matter which.
She waves her hand from above
If success be yours, then fly my dove.

EPITHEUS:

Thou art right.
"Yet shall I leave my skiff at home
Lest other folks should see.
I read it in a story book that for to kiss
his dear,
Leander swam the Hellespont, and I shall swim this here."

(Epitheus dives in front of River. As he dives the sound of splashing is heard. Morises exits right. Epitheus goes through the motions of swimming towards the opposite shore. River speaks.)

The Tragedy of The Oysterman (Continued)

RIVER:

Ah, young oysterman, thou art bold
To brave River as did lovers of old.
I will carry you safely on the crest of my wave.

Take heart, sir. Make haste! Be brave!

(River pushes him gently towards the shore. As Epitheus steps to the shore, Veronica steps forward to meet him. She speaks.)

VERONICA:

Ah, fair oysterman, kind oysterman
I see that thou at last
Have swum across the river so foreboding and so vast;

Yet do not let the rumors of my father
make you roam;

For there is nought to fear today.
My father is not home.

(Veronica and Epitheus sit down, side by side. He takes her hand.)

EPITHEUS:

Just today, I know I've learned
For what my sad heart long has yearned.

Yet always you sit here without another,

My dear, hast thou no other lover?

VERONICA:

How bitter sound those words upon mine ear.

A lover? Nay. My father sends them all away.

Once when I was younger

Was a suitor by my father slain.

And should he find another

Would he treat him yet the same?

(Epitheus is very frightened and starts nervously. He speaks with a very evident forced bravery.)

EPITHEUS:

Poor Veronica, hast all my pity.

What shame that we two lonely creatures

Must be separated by thy father's jealousy.

(Veronica looks up at him and speaks coquettishly.)

VERONICA:

And is it only your pity that I have?

EPITHEUS:

Nay, thou hast my love.

My heart I give to thee.

VERONICA:

Ah, the time we have together be too short.

Hark! Even now I hear my father's step.

Quick! Into the river thou must go.

Return I pray. I'll not forget.

Hast risked thy life to comfort me.

So I will pledge my life to thee.

(Veronica hurries him towards the river. Epitheus again dives in front of River, and makes motions of swimming to the accompaniment of splashing water. He glances back nervously as he swims. Veronica turns guiltily to face the approach of her father. She continues speaking.)

Hast returned early, my father.

MORTAGUE:

Aye, and was I not expected?

What was that splash I heard?

VERONICA (very nervously):

Oh! — I — It was nothing but a pebble, sir, I cast upon the water.

MORTAGUE (suspiciously):

Yet, what is that which swims so fast?

VERONICA (with growing anxiety):

Oh! Father! I — 'Tis nothing but a porpoise

That's been a swimming past.

MORTAGUE:

Ha! Ha! Then fine sport will this be.

I must down to my boat.

Now, fair daughter, bring me my harpoon.

I'll out upon the water and fix that porpoise soon!

(Veronica speaks aside to the audience very melodramatically.)

VERONICA:

Ah, my lover will be killed.

The Tragedy of The Oysterman (Continued)

There is nothing to live for.

Oh, I cannot! — I will not —

(Veronica swoons. Her father takes her in his arms. He speaks.)

MORTGAGE:

Hast fainted, my darling daughter!

What is it that makes thee swoon?

'Twas the devil's own time that it happened.

I'd have ended his pesky life soon!

CURTAIN

ACT ONE—SCENE TWO

The stage is now empty but for the space directly in front of River. Epitheus is still swimming, but River is holding him back. River speaks in a rasping voice.

RIVER:

Thou art a dastard not to wait

With fair Veronica to learn thy fate.

I brought thee there safely for I thought thee brave.

But now, my coward, ha ha! Sink to thy watery grave!

(River pushes him to the floor.)

CURTAIN

THE EPILOGUE

"Alas for those two loving ones, she waked not from her swoon,

And River took care of Epitheus, for in the waves he drowned.

But fate has metamorphosed them in pity of their woe.

And now they keep an oyster shop for mermaids down below."

Math vs. Cupid

The life old contest comes off each night,
When Math will fight 'gainst Cupid's might.

Cupid lands terrific blows, but Math is hard and on his toes.

For Cupid busily works every day

And Math just figures his time away.

He figures the angle from which to approach,

But if Cupid should hit him over the heart,

He might get love sick from the start.

Then Math would figure no more his attack

But punch as Cupid does and always come back.

One Christmas in Cherbourg

Virginia Morgan

His was the first figure to catch my eye that first night in Cherbourg. Had the scene been that of the crowded, clamorous train that I had just left instead of the tiny, tranquil village of my destination, I feel sure that his personage would still have singled itself out from all the rest to draw and hold my attention.

Advancing through the fast falling snowflakes, I soon found myself looking up into a pair of twinkling, kindly, black eyes, gazing honestly at the world from a face, care-worn and wrinkled—yet whose defects became invisible under the brilliant rays of a friendly, captivating smile.

"Pardon, monsieur," I ventured, "but could you direct me to the hotel?"

"Hotel?" he smiled, "I'm afraid Cherbourg does not yet boast one; but anyone desirous of lodging is always welcome to all Père Brete can offer."

"No hotel! Oh, how unfortunate! If I had but known—!"

"Do not let it trouble you, my dear; you shall come home with me. Madame Routeau will prepare you a room in no time."

Not daring to refuse such a hospitable offer, I obediently followed him down the slumbering village street, adorned here and there with a sleepy lamp yawning drowsily in the winter darkness. Glancing inquisitively at my new friend, I observed, as fully as the moonlight permitted, a large, well-built man dressed in the simple garb of a French priest whose only real sign of age was the few visible gray hairs, which would soon be as white as the December snow about us.

Pausing near the end of the street, Père Brete turned into a small, neat cottage nestling comfortably in its blanket of sparkling diamonds. It occurred to me quite suddenly that neither of us had spoken a word on the way.

After meeting the buxom, dark-haired housekeeper, Madame Routeau, and wrapped in the cozy warmth of the hearth, I explained my situation—how as a student in Paris I had always longed to spend the holidays in a small French village, and how, now that the chance had come, I must impose upon these dear people. They were, however, very understanding and insisted that I remain with them as long as I wished.

How delightful it was to be awakened every morning by the culinary craftiness of good Madame Routeau who knew only too well the secret of arousing young lazybones by a variety of appetizing aromas. And how refreshing it was to walk the humming village streets in the morning, to stroll leisurely along in the twilight of evening, and to tip-toe noiselessly home at a time when all honest souls were in bed. But best of all was the joy derived from the person of Père Brete. To watch him, listen to him, and chat with him was to live over again the sunbeams and raindrops of everyday life. His people—how he loved them! Their life was his. How readily he assumed their burdens and gave happiness in return.

A greater joy was now at hand—the time when "Peace on earth, good will toward men" rang strong and clear throughout the length and breadth of Cherbourg. To Père Brete, this was the happiest time of the year. Each night after evening prayers, he could be heard wielding hammer and saw in the shed; but he would smile mysteriously when questioned and beam lovingly upon all sunny little faces that shone now with a light of expectation and wonder.

Madame Routeau would wink knowingly and nod her dark head with pleasure.

"Ah, how he does love to make them for the children," she would whisper. "Whatever would they do without him?"

The Christmas celebration was the event of the year. Père Brete's little church, although always full, was filled to capacity on Christmas Day. It was the week that followed, however, that made his heart glow the brightest; for it was then that the good men of the village would call upon him, requesting that he don a costume and distribute gifts to the children.

But what was wrong with Père Brete? Christmas Day he had been so joyous, but now—!

"Père Brete," exclaimed Madame Routeau upon his return from church, "what is it? Are you so tired after yesterday's great celebration?"

Père Brete was silent. He seemed oblivious to everything. Lifting his heavy gray head, all the years which joy and happiness had so skillfully concealed revealed themselves in his sad eyes.

"They have not come this year," was the tremulous reply. "Monsieur Delsort has been chosen. I have grown too old for them."

"Oh, no, Père Brete," cried Madame, clasping his rough hands in hers, "surely, they would not do it if they knew how deep your heart is in it."

The old priest smiled slightly, a mere shadow of the smile that had first won me to him, and with a weary goodnight to each of us, trudged slowly up the narrow, creaking stairs.

Madame and I sat listlessly by the fire, watching the flame dying little by little as the night grew older around us. A slight tap at the door aroused us from our reveries to the realization that Monsieur Blanchard wished entrance.

One Christmas in Cherbourg (Continued)

"I have good news for Père Brete," was his breathless introduction. "Monsieur Delsort has been taken ill and we wish Père Brete to perform as usual."

"Oh, I am so glad!" exclaimed Madame. "How pleased he will be to hear it!"

After thanking Monsieur Blanchard over and over again and having wished him a fond good night, the exultant woman returned to her seat by the fire.

"We shall wait until morning to tell him," she beamed. "I am so happy for his sake."

Early the following morning Madame Routeau could be heard bustling about below. The picture was as plain as though I were actually there to watch her, setting out the damty blue china, drawing up Père Brete's favorite old arm chair, and poking the lazy provoking fire.

"Père Brete," she called, "you are late this morning. Hurry, I have news for you."

The little blue china dishes waited patiently; the old arm chair peered around in vain; the fire lingered hopefully for a helping hand, then disappeared completely. Silence, as white and as still as the snow outside, echoed in answer.

Harbingers of Autumn

The maple by the river
Flaunts a branch of crimson leaves,
While the woodbine on the fences
A design of crimson weaves.

The song birds leave their dwellings,
And to the South do fly,
With voices ever swelling,
Proclaim it to the sky.

Oh, there's something in the air,
That makes one long to roam
Down a hidden trail somewhere
That leads away from home.

All these things bear the tidings,
If you listen you may hear
The breezes softly whispering
That autumn time is near.

A Red Dawn

Elizabeth Miller

It had been a long, weary journey through sparsely settled country and over rough, rutted roads into nowhere. It had been a long, weary struggle to erect a home in the desolation of an unpopulated section; but it had been a far longer and a far wearier task to live in that home which had been created after the drawn out journey and after the endless weeks of manual labor.

Henry Arms had set forth from Connecticut to found a new home in the still unpopulated portion of New York State. With him, he took his wife, Sarah, and their small son, John. It was a great day when they set out from their home. People had come from miles around to say farewell to the ones who were joining the great migration westward. Yes, it seemed a great day to Sarah, the last day in civilization. Of course there would be people at the new home, but it would not, by any means, be like the community they were leaving.

John was greatly excited. He plied his father with queries as they wended their way on towards a new life.

"When do you think we'll get there, Father? Will there be any boys like me?"

"For the first, I can't promise any definite time. For the second, I think there will be a few," Henry replied as he looked down at the blue-eyed eagerness that was his son.

Many years have passed since then. Henry and Sarah have come, have seen, and have conquered. Green and brown fields slope away from their house in an infinity of wealth. Grazing cattle disturb nature's color scheme, dotting the landscape with black and white. Civilization has made its mark. There is a church next to the farm and a store and houses near by.

One clear day, Henry and John stored away the last bit of corn from the fields. Henry looked proudly at the bare, level acres and then at the great barns.

"Some season, wasn't it, Son?" he said contentedly.

"It certainly was, Dad."

They both felt a mutual satisfaction as they turned toward the house for supper.

Five hours later, John was awakened by the sound of frenzied dog barks. He turned over wearily and wished the dog would keep quiet. Then he opened his eyes to see if it was light. As he did so, he was galvanized into a stone image by the sight that met his eyes. On the wall, was a procession of dancing red imps. For a moment his mind was blank and uncomprehending. Then suddenly the meaning of the red light and the figures on the wall dawned on him. The barns were on fire! He made a mad dash for the door and bolted into the hallway.

"Dad! Mother! Quick! Wake up! The barns are on fire!"

He called again, his voice pitched high and unnatural in hysteria. However, John did not have to wait long, for at the beginning of his third call, the door was opened and his father rushed forth. He needed no second look. The hallway was illuminated by an unearthly light from John's open bedroom door.

"Well, don't stand there gaping," he roared. "Get some rugs and soak them. Take them up on the roof and try to heat out the embers that come from the barns. They're gone, but maybe we can save the house."

That night was a long, mad struggle. Henry and John, faces scarred and hair singed, worked furiously on the roof, with dripping rugs, clothes, anything that could be found, and beat them frantically against the burning embers.

Once Henry turned to encourage John. As he did so he saw the whole corner of the roof behind them consumed in flame. Madly he snatched something—he never knew what—and ran to the corner. His brain knew only one purpose and refused to recognize anything else. His foot stepped on forbidden territory. For an instant his body swayed backward and forward in terrible, perfect rhythm. Then there was a void space where once there had been a figure, and an awful noise was heard above the crackling laughter of the fire.

John turned, called, and, receiving no answer, ran for the trap door. He put his foot down, missed the ladder and fell through endless space to hit, in no gentle way, an uncompromising floor. His pain was silenced by the greater demand that preoccupied his thoughts. He picked himself up and ran to the adjoining room where he saw his mother tugging in vain at an inert figure draped over an old-fashioned bureau. Luckily the roof had caught first, and the lower floors were still safe; but as John and his mother struggled down the stairway with their burden, they could hear fire eating at the roof. It wouldn't be long before it would fall. They had to hurry.

A little while later John was again stirred by a blood-red light. This time, however, it was the light of hope and inspiration sent from the skies, not death and destruction. The glow of that dawn was broken by a group of isolated figures and a mass of charred ruins. The figures were a man, a woman, another form impossible to distinguish, and a dog. Thus man might have stood at the dawn of civilization, his hands empty, his possessions nothing, his resources everything—ready to build a new world; but would all this labor and all this drawn out struggle against time also be in vain?

When Ma Gets Sick

My Ma's ill with a cold in her head;
We called the Doc and he put her in bed.
Thinks I to myself, "I'll run this house right."

Oh, yeh! It looked easy, but our place is a sight,
Since Ma got sick.

The coffee's too strong and dinner is late;
I hurry and wonder why I made that big dare;

I'm rantin' and ravin' cause the roast
ain't done.

My gosh, it's way past one.
Just let your Ma get sick.

Been eatin' canned soup, 'til I'm filled to the brim,
With all sort of stuff you heat in the rin,
And when Ma's well again, and up and around

Will I crab 'bout the eats—No Ma'm!
—not a sound.

Since Ma was sick.

I tell you, Pa; I've learned my lesson,
These MOTHERS, you bet they're God's own blessin'!

What's that? You don't believe what I say?

Just wait till it happens to you some day.
When your Ma is sick.

—Lucille Kolb

The Great Marcy

Allen Dean

"Tahawus" it was called by the Iroquois. This, in English, means "he splits the sky." Where could one find a better name for this magnificent mass of granite, draped with a living blanket of evergreens? There she stood, towering a thousand feet above us like a mighty guardian of the valley in which we stood. Behind us was the pointed Colden; at our left, the massive peaks of McIntyre; at our right, the majestic dome of Skylight. But what did these matter when before us loomed the mighty Marcy, greatest of them all, with the reflection of her beautiful pointed cone shimmering in the tiny "Lake Tear" at our feet!

We were a small party of climbers: my father, two of my brothers, a couple of natives of the country, a vacationist from Pittsburgh, and myself. Our family had been enjoying the summer in a small mountain town a few miles away. I had always hoped for the chance to climb Marcy, so when my father suggested such a trip, I was naturally overjoyed.

Starting early one bright July morning, we had driven twenty miles to a small gravel drive. There we rode for fifteen minutes through a wonderful old forest, coming at length to the small Sanford Lake. Parking our cars, we shouldered our packs and set out across the lake on a rocking suspension foot bridge. We followed a trail for four miles past an old abandoned iron mine and through the very old forest. Here we stopped and ate our dinner by the Hudson River, a small stream at this place. Starting on, we noticed that the trail was ascending. It continued thus for about five miles where it dropped into a swampy valley. Hiking for another mile, we came upon a lean-to or three-sided cabin, many of which are built in the mountains by the state for the use of climbers. This one was near the sparkling Opalescent Brook and we decided to use it for the night on the way back. So dropping our packs, we went on unburdened. The next two miles were very steep, through a beautiful evergreen forest and along the rushing Feldspar Brook. At last the climb ended, and we stepped out of the woods at the foot of the delightful little "Lake Tear of the Clouds" with the peak of Marcy looming ahead. The air was crisp and so clear that we could hear some other climbers talking to each other a mile away at the top.

We rounded the lake and rested at another of the cabins. Then we started for the peak. The climb started so suddenly that it quite surprised us. At one moment we were walking over level ground, and at the next we were climbing at an angle of almost forty degrees. Any one who has done any mountain climbing will appreciate what this means. We were in a forest of shaggy spruces which were greatly stunted by the harsh weather they had seen, they grew almost horizontally from the ground as the ascent was so steep.

We had to rest every fifty yards or so, now. At one place where we stopped, I noticed a small side trail. Being inquisitive I decided to explore it, and taking three or four steps came upon a six-foot spruce blocking the path. I pushed it aside and stopped abruptly. There before me was a drop of more than a thousand feet! Another step would have sent me crashing into the rocky canyon of Indian Pass far below!

Getting back to the party, I saw them starting on the upward trail again. After about fifty feet the shaggy spruces gave way to crooked and scrawny pines of two or three feet. These finally disappeared at the timber line, and above this were only a few Arctic bushes clinging to the rocks. The climb now changed to a crawl on hands and knees over the hard granite, and at times we had to cling to the few bushes to keep from sliding down the steep mountain side. The wind was whipping at our clothing in a terrific gale, and one time my cap blew away but caught in a bush nearby.

After crawling steadily for about an hour, we at last reached a stone cabin built into the side of the mountain. Rounding this I plowed ahead and climbed the remaining few feet to the brass marker at the top. Marcy had been conquered! Off to the west the sun was setting behind Mt. McIntyre, the valley below us was already in partial darkness. Clouds were floating around my feet and bouncing off the mountain side below. The country about was silent; but I was happy. As Wordsworth wrote:

"Had this effulgence disappeared
With flying haste, I might have sent,
Among the speechless clouds, a look
Of blank astonishment;
But 'tis endued with power to stay,
And sanctify one closing day,
That frail Mortality may see——"

Culinary Capers

I sat upon the porch one night
Cooled by a gentle breeze.
I tried in vain to think and write
Some queer prof to please!

But alas, and alack! I could not think;
My thoughts had wandered off.
I heard the dishes in the sink,
As they clamored for a cloth.

It must be that I fell asleep
For I had the strangest dream:
I sensed a kettle chasing me,
Issuing clouds of steam.

Then at my lap I strangely gazed
For there was a cup and saucer.
And marching at a slower pace
Came a teaspoon gasping, "Water!"

Next in line was a frying-pan
Bringing memories of a steak.
He groaned, and then with a fierce demand,
Said, "Wash me, for goodness' sake!"

"Now all that I ask, dear friends of mine,"
Said I with trembling voice,

"Is a piece of soap and I'll not whine."
Said they, "You'll have no choice!"

—Jean Ertel

Behind the Footlights

Doris Allen

Slowly, stealthily, two frightened, but none the less excited, girls crept up to one of the most beautiful of all of the Sagamore's suites.

We're going to see Nazimova!

We're going to see Nazimova!

We're going to see Nazimova!

Suddenly, we came face to face with the small numbers which told us our search was at an end. During the interval between our knock and the appearance of the petite French maid, our minds ran in circles of Nazimova, Nazimova, and Nazimova. Oh, how to pronounce her name!

Finally, we were ushered into a lovely, dimly lighted room. And then, horror of horrors, wonder of wonders, we, two humble John Marshall students, were in the presence of one of the grandest troopers of our time, Madame Nazimova.

Reclining gracefully, in a beautiful peach negligee, was this fifty-seven year old actress, looking hardly twenty-seven years old. Nazimova, who was born in Russia, speaks with an accent much like that of Greta Garbo.

"Ah," she drawled, "Welcome! Welcome! How young and fresh you are, my dears."

Oh, dear! and we had meant to act so sophisticated! Well, it couldn't be helped now!

Theatrical even in her off stage moments, Nazimova wove a spell which made us quite speechless, but finally we managed blushing to tell her how we had enjoyed the play from which we had just come. She responded heartily to all our inquiries and the following conversation ensued after she had been asked to tell us a bit of her life:

Behind the Footlights (Continued)

"Well, you see," she said, "I was born in Russia in 1879 and when I was about six, I went to Switzerland where I received my early education. I then returned to Moscow where I studied for the stage in a dramatic school."

"How did you happen to go on the stage, Madame Nazimova?"

"Oh—that is rather hard to explain. It just happened that I had always been fond of the theater, such as it was in those days."

"We understand that you learned the English language in five months. Wasn't that quite difficult?"

"No, I shouldn't say that exactly. You see, I went on the stage in Saint Petersburg in 1904, and from there we went to London and then to New York City. New York held so much for me. I had so many new thrills and experiences that I immediately wanted to stay there. The play I was in was Russian, and I realized that its run would be short. Then came my big chance in the form of a contract to play in English. Learn your language I must, and learn it I did!"

"You are best known for your work in Hendrick Ibsen's plays. Will you tell us something of your parts, Madame?" we said, feeling as much at ease now as though we were in our own homes listening to the radio.

"I have played Hedda Gabler in the play you saw today, Nora in The Dolls' House, and Rita Allmers in Little Eyolf. For the most part, the reason I have played in so many of Ibsen's plays is that I am suited for the characters about which he writes because of my accent. I liked my roll of the tortured mother in Ghosts best of all."

When asked about embarrassing moments she said, "Oh, yes, I've had them too. Once I was required to make a very rapid change from one type of clothing to another. I think it was from a riding habit to a formal. Well, I became so fearful of missing a cue that I ran on to the stage disregarding entirely the frantic exclamations of my maid. In the scene, I was required to sit down and cross my legs; as I did so, I heard a faint tittering in the audience which quickly grew louder; wonderingly I looked down, and to my utter amazement as well as embarrassment, I found that I had forgotten to put on my shoes."

"We understand, Madame, that you at one time received twenty-eight curtain calls from a callous New York audience. How does that make you feel?"

"It makes me, for the most part, want to cry; I always think, however, that the applause is for the author of the play and not for me."

"Are you looking forward to your opening in New York?"

"Yes, but at the same time these one-night stands are quite interesting. I get very little rest, however. Every day the play comes a little closer to perfection; so we think it is worth while. I should like to tell you girls how much Rochester is thought of in the theatrical world. You see, in show business, this idea of one-night stands is used chiefly to get criticisms, and Rochester audiences are known all over the United States for their dramatic connoisseurs."

So with her kind praise of "our town"
the interview was over, and our hearts were a bit calmer as our thoughts circled around the talented woman, who so generously had given of her moment of leisure just before she appeared behind the spot-lights, and the public claimed its own.

Thanksgiving Day

Thanksgiving day brings memories clear
Of that little band of Pilgrims so dear:
Their grateful hearts in thankful praise,
To Almighty God their songs they raise.

The Mayflower, the ship that brought
That little band of souls that sought
The Promised Land, so far away,
That's why we have Thanksgiving Day.

They gave up all for God on High,
And he seemed always very nigh;
When only fifty odd remained,
Their Christian Faith was still the same.

Would that our hearts would thankful be
For all the blessings that we see:
For churches, schools, and homes so dear
Our hearts should be grateful all the year.

—John Dosseter

Reminiscence

When I've grown old, with hair a silvery gray.

I'll think not of a sad and gloomy day
Which I have known; but rather of a time
When life was sweet, when I was in my prime.

There'll be no room for memories filled
with strife;

I shan't recall the bitterness of life.
Want, shall I, that hard-earned peace of mind—

Forget, shall I, that life has been a grind.

I'll think of all the happiness I've known—

A happy childhood in a happy home.
Then youth, and love, and on through middle-age

In reminiscent mood I'll turn each page;
And as I wait to walk the last long mile,
I hope I'll find my life has been worth while.

—Mary E. Neiss

New Schools for Old

Jean Marsielle

Say, Father Marshall, thou hast seen

Full many a sprightly race;

Footsteps 'cross the narrow green

The paths of duty traced.

They left thy porralls and now do walk

Along the marble halls, and talk.

Shall all the old be quite forgot

And praise be given the new;

Or, shall the blending of them both

Strengthen thy spirit true?

Gone are the days beyond recall when everybody knew everybody else and our school dances resembled town meetings, both for the faculty and the students. In the "good ole' days" Mr. Friel would "cut in" on Mary Jane Barry, and the two would glide gracefully over the smooth dance floor surrounded by the latest thing in electrical equipment and interior decorating. The last phrase does sound well even though it is a trifle exaggerated. Perhaps we didn't have all the modern conveniences but we did have one essential factor—friendliness.

All former residents of the deceased member of Rochester's Educational System readily recall Jack Kelsey's oratorical and dramatical participations in the school curriculum. He cheered on many a despondent freshman and literally kept the seniors in stitches when he issued forth a speech packed with wit and humor.

Another prominent figure in Marshall's history was Carl Mathews, renowned as an able executive and an incessant blusher. Many longing sighs were released by the females when he strode down the one quarter of a mile of passage which was commonly referred to as the "main corridor."

Then, too, how could we forget that athletic statesman, Rolfe Scofield (popularly known as "Scofe") whose long, lanky arm could seize a mere basketball and calmly deposit it in the gaping basket while the members of the opposing team scurried furtively around looking more than a trifle bewildered? How could we forget a fraction of this six-foot, four and one-half-inch, staunch Marshallite? Many were the puny freshmen who did their daily exercises and perhaps even secretly tied their mistreated feet to the bedposts at night in hope that some day they, too, would become "high and mighty seniors."

Please don't assume that all of the prominent residents of the late factory were males. Far be it from me, as a member of the fair sex, to present all the orchids to the fellows. Our feminine aspirants have achieved fame in many lines. The ever-popular Betty Scott—actress, singer, executive; Barbara Tarbox and her scholastic, athletic, and governmental record; the unlimited pep and lung-power of "Jinny" Malley; the scholastic and executive ability of Jean Troy, the girl with the earrings; the "art for art's sake" Eleanor Sederquist, whose specialties were dancing and painting; our ambitious and capable editor-in-chief, Ruth Rhoden; the enviable records of "Johnnie" Ancona, "Jackie" Sullivan, "Millie" Lockner and Norma Doell are all proof of the fact that the feminine members of our race fast over-stepped the males in many phases of life.

We'll admit that our school wasn't all a bed of roses. We received many a shower from various sources. The pipes overhead were continually oozing with aqua pura. The heating system was not in the pink of condition, and coats were in frequent use. These facts only served to stimulate our enjoyment, however, and "nous nous amusons bien."

From the above paragraph one might gather the opinion that the author sees no advantages in the "New School." Quite the contrary, I am rather overwhelmed with the beauty and efficiency of this architect's masterpiece. There are many practical advantages of this edifice, also. The complete stage-equipment with its quantities of lights, curtains, and drops surpasses by far our "one-horse town" theatrical properties of our "lost brother." We are justly proud of our astoundingly modern broadcasting system. Surely the "gyms" are superior to our former combination of gym and assembly hall. The huge lunchroom, the up-to-date heating system, and even the modernistic furniture indicate the supremacy of our new school.

The majority of the students who had the opportunity to spend a year or two in the two buildings labeled "John Marshall High School" have come to the pleasant conclusion that, regardless of the housing facilities, Marshallites have always had, and, we hope, will continue to have, true school spirit.

Marshall's Canterbury Tales

Prologue

As in Chaucer's day of pilgrimages
So we have them in these modern ages.

Daily troop through Marshall's portals,
Students many, who are just plain mortals,

And about these different few
I have a story to tell to you.

The Honor Student

There is the boy who studies all night,
And has to wear glasses to help his sight.

Marshall's Canterbury Tales (Continued)

At movies and dances he is never found,
And always has an armful of books well bound.

His teachers all think he is the best
In the classroom, and then to all the rest
They praise him until the others get mad,

And silently, secretly call him a cad.
I often wonder what he finds in Caesar
That I never did, or the others either.

Newton's laws he knew to perfection,
And from "Macbeth" he'd quote a selection.

He always gets red in front of girls,
But on the side he admires their curls.

He always practices the golden rule,
And homeward, homeward right after school.

The Probation Student

This girl's the one who always has dates
On week-day nights and always hates

In the early morning, to get out of bed,
And go to school with her eyes all red.

She thinks that Beethoven is a hound,
But likes to hear music go 'round and
'round.

Every night in seventh she sits
And combs her hair and reddens her lips.

Every few minutes she looks at the clock.

And hopes the teacher will get small pox.

She looks at a song sheet and starts to sing.

When all of a sudden the school bells ring.

She puts on hat and picks up her book
And holds up her mirror for one last look.

Out of the door like a shot from a gun
Off to the "Sugar Bowl" she must run.

—Doris Allen

Studying

I open up my algebra
And start to find the page
On which our teacher asked us
The lesson to engage.

I take a large eraser,
A pencil, and a paper,
And finding my assignment,
With figures start to caper.

But soon my memory wanders,
And I am far away
From thoughts of school and studies.
To dreams of fun and play.

Into a place where lessons
No more are known by man,
And every day is summer
With the daylight-saving plan.

At once a voice awakes me
From such sweet reveries:
By one of those sly parents
Who keep us from our ease.

And hopelessly I turn once more
Where hated studies throng,
Trying to keep my mind upon
The pages, stern and long.

But once again I travel
From studies, always hard,
This time no one recalls me
The work I disregard.

And so I keep on dreaming,
Until I'm brought to earth
By a doorbell loudly clanging,
Or the telephone's ringing mirth.

After fruitless concentration
On work that's so obtruse,
I loudly slam the covers
And mutter, "What's the use!"

—Alan Dean

City Streets

Elaine Gleichauf

Day after day we pass through them, those stuffy streets. What tales they could tell if they could but speak. One can half shut one's eyes and imagine the stately figures of one, two, three generations ago, moving about the brilliant pavements of the sunlit streets. Now it is all changed. The old aristocratic families have left their homesteads which have been converted into apartments, and have moved into the fashionable sections of the city. An occasional carriage block or a suffocated lilac bush are the only reminders of the past life which was once prevalent here.

As one strolls down the walks one sees many interesting sights. Sometimes an Italian organ grinder with his monkey can be distinguished from the hoard of merchants, yelling children, and gossiping matrons. Soap-box socialists and checkered suited gamblers are not uncommon. The only shade is from the washings which stretch across the streets, from one apartment to another.

The day wanes, and night slowly enters into the turmoil. As Lord Dunsany writes, "Black cats crept from silence places and the life came out that knew the night." Coarse women and lurid men walk the pavements. Sinister figures lurk in doorways, and all the children have disappeared, except for a lone newsboy with a raucous voice.

At last the time comes when all individuals must sleep. The saloons gradually close. An ugly baby yells for the final time. A lone drunk utters his last curse, and peace pervades, as a hot breeze wafts gently over the refuse cans.

Radio Rhymes

A woman's scream that rends the air,
A villainous laugh that raises the hair,
The strike of a gong,
The thrum of a song,
Or the beat of a drum near a maddened throng.

A strain of music that's sweet and slow
Or a clear young voice so very low,
The crash of a band,
The voice of a land
That fills all the room at the touch of a hand.

A swingy rhythm or a rollicking air,
Someone to dance with for whom you care,
The music of kings,
The magic that rings
Over the ether waves' mystical wings.

—Agnes O'Conner

A Storm

The sky grows black, the air grows dense;
Foreboding, bleak clouds form:

The Lightning Lord unsheaths his sword,
And then — the blinding storm.
Great trees that have withstood all force
Moan prayers and beg to stand,
But powers of years and tears count naught,

They fall, by King Storm's command.
The rivers grow; they swell, o'erflow!
The earth becomes a sea;

The grains, like clay, are washed away;
The Storm King heeds no plea.
At last the flag of peace unfurls,
The Rainbow, loved by all the world,

—Lois Callaghan

Fleecy Clouds

A strange unrest comes over me
Whenever fleecy clouds I see;
I long to gorge myself in rain,
To scatter it o'er hill and plain;
Perhaps revive some drooping flower
Hid deep in some sequestered bower
Where men have passed but could not see
Its loneliness and misery.

—Mildred Evans
