Preface

This annual is the outcome of the precedent which was established by the class of June, '04, and which the succeeding Senior class somewhat modified by combining with the CLARION. It is intended simply as a pen and picture memorial of June, '06, together with a record of other school activities. Arrangements for this issue were only concluded at a late date, and the Annual is not what more time might have made it. So following the usual custom of such publications, we also have an apology. May future classes have no need of one! Nevertheless, here it is and we hope that it will preserve only pleasant memories of our class.

A Corner in Bugs

Only death can obliterate the memorable date, 1920, from the minds of those who were so unfortunate as to be alive during that year. Its terrors will ever darken the pages of twentieth century history. Spontaneously, on the thirtieth of June organized bands of potato bugs descended upon the eastern states of the great republic of America, and began a campaign of unparalleled devastation and universal occupation. Abject terror seized every home which had not already been occupied by these ravishing hordes. Traffic of every sort was paralyzed. Electric cars were forced to a standstill after hundreds of futile attempts to operate them, automobiles slipped over the gore of crushed beetles only to come to a sudden stop and people scarcely made their passage through the streets of the cities on the backs of potato bugs that cracked and collapsed under the unusual weight. Millions of these beetles were killed and millions of others took their places. Where they came from or when they intended to leave were questions of dispute and speculation. But the fact remained that they were everywhere. They infested men's pockets and ladies' hats. One might awake in the night and discover several potato bugs on an expedition of exploration in his mouth or ear. The fields were devastated and famine threatened the people. Unsuccessful attempts were made to exterminate these fearful pests, and fabulous rewards offered to the fortunate man who should devise a practical method.

The usually quiet village of Chugs was likewise disturbed and excited by the beetles. The scene in this place was a repetition of that in other districts. Probably the only serene persons in the vicinity were Professor Charles Quack and Mr. James Harry. The one was a gentleman whose hands or brains had never earned a red cent but providentially his respected sire had thrust a fortune upon him at his decease, while incessant dabbling with chemicals and repeated unsuccessful experiments had caused the unearned title of "Professor" to be prefixed to his already significant surname. The other lived mainly at the expense of his friend and various jobs of all sorts and descriptions which he found irregularly during summer and winter gave him the fitting nickname of "Odd Job" Harry. The only resemblance the two curious characters possessed was that both allowed their imaginations to soar heavenward. Whether it was a movable hen roost or a noiseless nut meg greater whose excellencies the "Professor" was preparing to reveal to the gullible public was of little moment to James. He sat almost daily amidst the din and smell of the laboratory with a pipe in his mouth and a satisfied smile on his face. Probably the reason Mr. Quack had adopted "Odd Job" Harry was because the latter proved such an attentive listener and flattering approver of his flighty notions and probably why this adoption satisfied James Harry was that it improved him financially and enabled him to indulge in tobacco and idleness more than before.

For several days past, wild schemes for the extermination of the potato bugs had flooded the brain of Mr. Quack. The night of liberation arrived in due course and, as usual, "Odd Job" Harry was the receptacle of his ideas. The "Professor" opened the conversation.

"James, I have been considering this question of the extinction of the doryphora decemlineata from a philanthropical standpoint and have reached a definite conclusion. The result of my investigation is an effective compound with which I propose to rid the town of these beetles. A reward of ten thousand dollars has been offered to the fortunate person who accomplishes such a result. I rely upon your assistance."

"You shall have it," interrupted Harry.

The "Professor" continued, "In the morning you will rent the large, empty building to the north of the town, and I will post an advertisement offering one cent per quart for these beetles. When the pests are all collected in the cellar of the building, I will destroy them."

"Odd Job" Harry only arranged himself in a comfortable position in the laboratory arm chair and puffed volumes of tobacco smoke into space. The "Professor" continued his work, and the other meditated until the night reached its zenith and then both retired to dream of fame and fortune from patent bug exterminators.

The next day the good citizens of Chugs noticed placards in conspicuous parts of the village. These announced Quack's plot in flaring headlines: "Wanted, twenty-five thousand potato bugs at one cent per quart." Furthermore the notices explained that a fifty dollar prize would be presented to the person who collected the largest number. Other details of arrangement followed in order.

The unique plan appealed to all, since a financial impetus was given to the movement for the extermination of the beetles. The people actually abandoned all their various occupations and went to work with an encouraging determination to collect bugs. Quack and his assistant were busily engaged for the next half week in the improvised building. The one measured and paid for the consignments while the other emptied them into the cellar. The bugs flowed into the building like a spring freshet down a gully. They came in boxes, bags and wagons. Little boys and old men, girls as well as their elders deposited their collections and received pay according to the amounts. At the end of the second day half the bugs which had tormented the town for the last fortnight were gathered in the Quack building. The fourth day passed with no relief in sight, and toward evening the exhausted "Professor" locked the door of the building, after posting a notice on the exterior, "No more bugs wanted." Outside the mob was clamoring for admission to dispose of more beetles. Heedless of their demands, the two inmates arranged themselves on some old blankets and were soon beyond the power of noise. Hours disappeared and toward daybreak, "Odd Job" Harry was aroused from his slumbers by a piercing shriek. No sooner was he on his feet than he saw a piteous spectacle. The "Professor" stood in the middle of the floor, jumped up and down and at the same time shaking potato bugs from his long hair, coughing them out of his mouth and vainly resisting their intrusions up his sleeves and down his neck. With a painful suddenness James remembered that he had neglected to shut the cellar door, the night before. The result of his carelessness was evident on all sides, for the striped beetles had entire possession of the building. "Odd Job" gazed in silence at the "Professor's" fantastical movements, but the latter soon spoke in a maniacal tone.

"We cannot allow these destructive creatures to escape from this build-

Class Poem

I.

A glorious summer day has spent its strength,
The glowing, round, red sun has sunk from sight,
The verdant hills are clothed in purple splendor
And crimson skies announce the approach of night.

II.

The soft warm breezes fan the lofty trees,
And bend and kiss the waters of the stream,
Which, rushing onward in its hurrying course,
Sparkles and glistens in the golden gleam.

III.

And in this sheltered valley 'neath the hills,
A tiny cottage nestles, the hills, in this way
Protected from each wind and stormy blast
Which might have swept its frail form away.

IV.

And now the sun's warm glow has passed away,
The fleeting clouds have lost their golden light,
The moon has risen 'bove the tumbling waves,
And casts upward the stream her glimmer bright.

V.

And now from out the cot its dwellers come,
The gray-haired father, with his faithful wife
Upon his arm, with faces sad and wise,
To start their son upon his future life.

VI.

The boy stands lingering on the grassy bank,
And casts his wistful eyes, so frank, so bright,
Upon the well known hills, the home of youth,
Which seem more luring in the silver light.

VII.

A yearning sadness clouds his youthful face,
A pang of sorrow seems to cleave his breast,
A longing for the things now passed away,
A dread to start out on this unknown quest.

VIII.

His father lays his hand upon his arm,
And pointing towards the waters gliding there,
He guides him to the path of righteousness,
And warns him of the evils which ensnare.

IX.

"My son, that is the river Life," he says,
"To-night you set out on your lonely course,
To-night you leave this tender home of youth,
'Tis well you leave it, not without remorse.

X.

This river rises many miles above,
And frolics all the way, but roughens more,
A little down below, and 'round that bend,
To safely pass it needs a steady oar.

XI.

Up here, the kind hills hide it from the wind,
But farther down are neither hills nor trees,
And if not on your guard, you will be tossed
Upon the shore, by each brisk blowing breeze.

XII.

And all along the way are wicked ports
Which but allure the youth, and perjure him
To do rash follies, and but draw him on
To paths of wrong, of wickedness and sin.

XIII.

Yield not to them, nor even stop to rest,
For some rude tempter, then, will chance your way,
And by his artful plans and pleasing words,
Will surely cause you from the truth to stray.

XIV.

Just one word more before you leave us, boy,
This river is, Oh! many fathoms deep,
And many sharp rocks jut from out its depths,
And from their paths this is the way to keep.

XV.

You see that silver light the pale moon casts?
That is the path of righteousness, my boy,
But steer in that, and every rock you'll see,
And now, farewell, my only son, my joy."

XVI.

A flash of pleasure lights the boy's sad face,
Here is a goal to reach, a pledge to keep;
And now he joyfully unmoors the boat
And launches out upon a fearless deep.

XVII.

Away he glides, straight in that silver path,
And at the bend he rises in the light,
And silhouetted 'gainst the starry skies,
With hand to brow, he disappears from sight.

GLADYS MAY BARBER

Class History

The prophets' realm is in the future. He may paint his picture as bright as he wishes. But the historian looks to the past and his work deals with facts and happenings as they were.

To glance over the memorable events in the career of the Class of June, nineteen six, one must needs go back to a day in the fall of 1902, a day of which our parents were proud, when we as a class entered the Rochester High School. '06 hardly realized then, as we slowly extended our acquaintance and learned with grass green freshness the ways of High School life, that sometime our class would be graduating from High School.

It was in April of the class's freshman year that, at the completion of the new building on the east side, the school moved to its present location. '06 excepting the the annex students, was in the old building long enough to appreciate the new one. Many of those who were at the old building will remember Professor Glen's room in the old H. R. S., as the place where they began High School.

During '06's Sophomore year the class began to feel more of a unit, with a good yell to let others know that 1906 was in existence. Many times since has the Assembly Hall been filled with that rousing yell of "Rah, Rah, Rah, Rah, Rix."

When 1906's Senior year swung around a large number of those who had spent three years of High School days in the class, left to complete their course in the new West High School. We wondered on return for the last year where so many of the class's companions had gone. They were missed and we were glad to hear that they were keeping up the name of '06 at the new school. In the class meet, held during the spring of this year, 1906 took first place. The class is following the custom of former classes in regard to a Senior play, in which she will prove her talent.

Last fall the Seniors of the West High School showed their attachment and good will for the Seniors of the East High School in a very pleasing manner, which was much appreciated and will be responded to in the near future. In the Senior dances, also, the graduating classes of both schools are intending to join in a brotherly fashion.

'06 through all four years has found a trusted friend in Mr. Wilcox; held somewhat at first in awe but now in great esteem.

Naught-six has seen during her course the great growth in the number of High School students in the city, the wonderful development in the High School life and the branching out of different lines. She has watched the increasing interest in debating, the undertakings of the Latin Department, has looked upon winning teams and read and listened with interest to the literary and musical productions of the school. But naught-six has not only looked on, especially in her last year have her members been right amongst things and have not let the light of the East High School fade. If there has been any lack in class spirit, the school itself has been well served. Many of the class have done their best in service of the school in the different lines—the athletes, the debaters, and musical and literary geniuses and those who have quietly upheld the scholarly record of the school. In these various ways '06 has proven of what talent she is composed.

Now 1906 is coming to her parting day. Soon the class will join the throng of graduates and sing the "Alma Mater" with more meaning. The door of opportunity has been wide open during these years for the training and education of the class. And now with hearts grateful for all that has been learned, 1906 goes forth, some to put into practice that which has been taught, some to gain further knowledge. But may the different members have clinging to their minds the pleasant experiences in the Class of June, '06, in which they served their school and in which they were served by their school, when as men and women of the world, they look back upon their High School days. May the class ever think of their school with all love and affection and show that the time has been well spent in the training and guidance, so freely given by the school, for the preparation for higher things of the members of the Class of June, 1906.

Seniors' Alphabet

- A is for Andrews, a girl hard to rule ;
Also for Angevine, the star of our school.
B is for Barss, for Bentley, for Barry ;
Also for Briggs, who trips like a fairy.
C is for Conklin, a boy very tall ;
Also for Chamberlain, who pitches fine ball.
D's for DeMallie, who so loves to eat ;
Also for Dana, a page small and sweet.
E is for Eves, a boy known to all ,
And also for Ely, so pretty and tall.
F is for Force, a child we acknowledge,
And also for Field who is going to college.
G is for Greenberg, who studies all night,
And also for Garson, a wondrous sight.
H is for Hinkston, so good and so true,
And also for Harned, a pretty girl, too.
I is for Irving, whose last name is Beale,
Who thinks not at all and says a great deal.
J is for Johnson, Beulah by name,
And also for Jennings of wide singing fame.
K is for Klink, a fusser you know ;
You can see a girl with him wherever you go.
L is for Lee, an athlete of might ;
Also for Lowenthal, who thinks he's quite right.
M's for Marine, a musician of fame,
And also McMath, quite harmless and tame.
N is for Northrup, most wondrous to tell,
He tickles the ivories and plays very well.
O's for O'Brien, who n'er was ensnared
By the questions of teachers or the word unprepared.
P is for Paviour and Peet, also clever,
Whose good works in this book will live on forever.
Q is for Quitters, scorn them! I say.
May their poor hearts soon wither away.
R is for Rutherford, strong, fair and ruddy,
Who loves the dear girls and thinks less of study.
S is for Stewart, he grinds all the day,
And hopes in the future, perhaps it will pay.
T is for Taylor, a girl bright and fair,
With lovely dark eyes and dark flowing hair.
U is for Us, shake hands one and all,
For we're going to college as soon as it's fall.
V is for VanHoesen, very modest and shy,
An angel by nature, we're afraid he will die.
W is for Williams, may he live ere so long,
As to write for the East High one original song.
X is a letter, its value unknown,
Over which many students will sigh and will moan.
Y is for Young, tall, lean and lanky ;
He's a jolly good fellow, though sometimes quite cranky.
Z is the end. We hope now you'll fix
Deep in your memories, the Class of Naught Six.

Extracts from the High School Primer.

(with abject apologies to Eugene Field.)

The Teacher.

What is this, an Ogre grinning at the Naughty Little Boys? Oh, no. This is not an Ogre. It is a teacher. The teacher is handing out a jest which she read in an 1847 almanac. Do the children love their teacher? Oh my, yes.

The Grind.

What is this angle worm doing in the school house? Naughty, naughty! This is not an angle worm it is a Grind. He is a very bright boy. Little Johnny looks angry. He does not like the Grind. Never mind when we get him outside we will strike him on the head with a baseball bat. Then we shall feel better. Shall we not!!

The Fountain.

Is this a dilapidated ash can? Certainly not! This is a drinking fountain. It is very healthful. How do you drink? Very simple. You open your mouth and squirt the nice warm water into it. Why is it healthful? Because you cannot swallow the water. It all runs down the outside of your neck instead of the inside. We will never swallow any microbes from this fountain. Will we?

The Gym.

How did the little boys get caught in the mouse trap? Alas! This is not a mouse trap. It is a gymnasium. Be careful! Do not swing your feet too far on the trapeze. Four boys are wrestling. This makes the floor quite crowded. Large gymnasiums are full of draughts. No one has ever caught cold here.

The Yellow Slip.

What is this? A piece of the original Magna Charta? Oh, no. This is a yellow slip. The date has been changed nineteen times and fourteen pupils have been excused by it. It is very nice for the little boys and girls, is it not? Almost as good as a check.

The Doughnuts.

Where are the two Boa Constrictors going with the little boy? Nonsense, that is a Frosh carrying two lunch room doughnuts. Presently he will grapple with them. If he gets a half-Nelson or a Hammerlock he will be able to eat them. If he does they will make him sorry that night. Poor lad. He will see real moukeys with green eyes and other nice things.

The Stage.

Why are all the people trying to stand on the lap-board? Tut, tut! This is not a lap-board. It is the assembly hall stage. At present, it has an extension. Soon this will be removed. Then we will move the piano on. Then the actors will be hoisted on pulleys and perform in the air. This is a stage with a high moral influence.

A Legend of the Genesee

Softly the Genesee sang to itself in the forest,
Sang as it rippled along, and glanced and gleamed in the moonlight.
Now was the Moon of Leaves, and the trees that bent o'er the waters,
Shone in their painted robes, faint yellow and red in the shadow.
Off in the depths of the woods, the restless winds ceaselessly whispered,
Speaking Manitou's will to the myriad things of the forest.
Gladly they hear and obey, as braves when the chief has commanded,
Men cannot understand it, for they alone will not listen,
They do not know what the river so softly is singing forever,
Down through the listening woods.

Far above in the treetops, the owl, the sentinel hooted.
The Senecas peacefully slept, and the moon that silvered their wigwams
Smiled as a mother smiles, as she watches her babe who is sleeping.
Suddenly forth from a wigwam, and down to the bank stole a maiden,
With moccasins soft as the fur that the Great Spirit wraps around the chestnut.
Fine was her doeskin robe, and her beads shone bright in the moonlight,
Flashing with every tint of the morning dew in the sunshine.
Fearful she glanced around, her eyes wideopen with terror.
Trembling at every call of the nightowl off in the forest,
Sickening dread at her heart, she made her way down to the water,
Ever glancing around at the silent cluster of wigwams.
Down through the Beautiful Valley, the river guided her pathway,
Threading its winding way, here shadowed, here spattered with moonlight,
Silent and swift she sped, till her heart beat quickly and wildly,
Like the fluttering swallow she'd found broken-winged in the forest.
Soon she saw in the East a glow of red, like a campfire
All the birds of the forest broke into jubilant singing,
Striving to wake the sun; and, drowsy, he came from his wigwam.
Then she went to the river, and knelt at its tender green margin,
Bathed her hot face, and threw herself down on the dewladen mosses.
Closing her weary eyes, then suddenly sprang up and started;
Quick as the frightened squirrel and darted again down the pathway,
Goaded on by a fear, that wildly tore at her heart-strings.

When the last Moon of Blossoms had filled the forest with fragrance
All the Six Nations had leagued against a tribe to the Eastward.
Round the Seneca campfire they danced in their terrible warpaint,
Plunged off into the forest, with tomahawks thirsty for battle.
Seven nights saw them gone, and then they came back with a captive,
Straight as a pine, and tall, with a bearing proud as a sachem's,
Eyes like the blue night sky, and hair like the yellow corn tassel.
Closely the tribe crowded round, as he stood in the glow of the campfire,
Silent with wonder and awe they gazed at the beautiful stranger.
Shrinking away from the rest, wide-eyed, the chief's daughter watched him.
Then the old chief of the Senecas spoke to the braves of his council,
Told them that Manitou surely had sent this wonderful stranger;
Told the tribe how one night in the dusk, as they followed the Hurons,
Stealthily keeping their trail, in a sinuous line like a serpent,
Suddenly they had found him, asleep in the fragrant pineneedles.
Surely Manitou guided this youth with hair like the sunlight
Into the Beautiful Valley; so in the dew of the morning,
Mid'st the blue haze of the forest they smoked the peacepipe with the Hurons
Then marched off through the forest homeward, bringing the stranger.

Calmly the captive stood, the red glow lighting his features,
 Quietly waiting the end; but then the Seneca chieftain,
 Bringing him moccasins soft, and a beautiful mantle of doeskin,
 Laid the gifts at his feet, and motioned to him to take them.
 Startled and dazed was the youth, like a man in the dark tangled forest
 When straight into his eyes the blinding sun suddenly flashes.
 Mute with amazement he looked at the gifts at his feet and the warriors,
 Scarcely seeming to know what the Seneca sachem was saying,
 Telling the men of the tribe that henceforth the youth was their brother.
 Down where the Genesee sings softly along through the forest,
 Midst the whispering elms they built him a beautiful wigwam.
 All through the summer moons, while he lived with the Seneca nation
 Manitou smiled on their cornfields, pleased with their care for the stranger,
 Pleased with his beautiful house, and the gifts that the Senecas brought him.
 Slowly the yellow-haired stranger learned the words of their language.
 Then, when the golden haze hung shimm'ring and soft o'er the river,
 Speaking in broken words, to the darkeyed Seneca maiden,
 Stories strange he would tell of a land that lay far to the Eastward.
 Told her how weary he was of this dark, mysterious forest,
 Tired of its tangled shades, and the ceaseless song of the river,
 How he longed to go back to his home, in the land toward the sunrise.
 Gazing up into his face with eyes full of sorrow, she listened;
 Every day from the forest she brought him armfuls of flowers,
 Berries, and nuts that the squirrels were hoarding away for the winter,
 Grieving because he hated to stay with the Seneca nation
 Trying to please him with beautiful gifts she had found in the valley.
 Then as they sat one day alone by the murmuring river,
 Softly the stranger spoke of a beautiful girl of his nation,
 Called her as fair and as sweet as the flower of the trailing arbutus,
 Off in the land of the morn she ever waited his coming,
 Watching for him to return from the trackless maze of the forest.
 Restless he paced up and down, his eyes on the trail by the river.
 Silent the Seneca maid rose, and slipped back to the wigwam;
 There, at the door of the tent, she found the old chief with a runner,
 Panting and tired, who had come in haste to the Seneca sachem,
 Telling that all the woods to the North were full of Oneidas,
 Lurking along the trail, below the path to the Eastward.
 Scarcely she listened or cared, but lay face down on the doeskin,
 Still as the silent pool, in whose depths dwelt a beautiful maiden,
 Gazing back, when she bent to look in its motionless water.
 All through the afternoon she silently lay in the wigwam,
 Then, in the dewy dusk, she stole down again to the river,
 Went to the house of the stranger, called and waited an answer.
 Only a whistling bird replied, as he flew o'er the treetops,
 So she entered the tent, and found that the stranger had vanished.
 Quick as a lightning flash, she knew he had gone to his people,
 Following the trail of the river that led through the Beautiful Valley.
 Then she thought of words she had heard from the fleet-footed runner,
 How all the woods by the river were full of lurking Oneidas,
 Deadly and still as the snake, ready and lying in ambush,
 Quickly she'd summon the braves, and they would hasten to save him,
 Bring back the yellow-haired youth again to the Seneca village,
 Back to the life that he loathed in his tent by the murmuring river,
 Still he would long in his heart for the land that lay toward the sunrise,
 Long for the beautiful maid like the flower of the trailing arbutus.
 Then to her anxious heart Manitou whispered his counsel,

Told her to go herself as swift as the wind to o'ertake him,
 Ere he could reach the place where the savage Oneidas were lurking,
 Then she would guide him around by a winding trail to the Eastward,
 Out of the path of foes and leading away towards his nation.
 So she went back to the wigwam and crushed her heart into silence,
 Waited until the night brought deep sleep down on the forest,
 Then without stirring a leaf she slipped from the tent in the darkness,
 Sped down the river trail, and fled all night through the shadows.

All of the forest world rejoiced at the coming of morning,
 Only the Seneca maiden, unheeding, fled on by the river.
 Surely he could not have gone beyond the bend to the Eastward,
 Then she shuddered to think of the lurking Oneidas beyond it,
 Shut her eyes on the picture, and then as she looked up before her—
 There, on the scarlet leaves, in the shade of a wide-spreading hemlock,
 Leaning against the trunk, she saw the yellow-haired stranger.
 Startled, in utter amazement, he looked at the Seneca maiden,
 Sprang to his feet, as she sank exhausted down on the pathway.
 Down from the little brook that babbled and danced o'er the pebbles,
 Splashing along by the path, he brought her the icy-chilled water.
 When she had rested a little, she told him how she had come there,
 Knowing that he would be lost in the leafy maze of the forest,
 Knowing the trail by the river was full of the hidden Oneidas;
 Told him that she would have sent the Senecas swiftly to save him,
 Only she knew they would never have let him go back to his nation,
 Thinking that Manitou surely had sent them this wonderful stranger,
 That, if they let him go, no more would he smile on their cornfields:
 So she had followed, herself, to guide his way through the forest,
 Bringing food, and a bow, and a quiver of poisonous arrows.
 Rising, she led him down to a tangled thicket of brushes,
 Lightly drew them apart, and there the hidden trail started,
 Bathed in a golden haze from the radiant sun in the heavens,
 Narrow, and leading his way through the depths of the bright painted forest.
 Then she unclasped from her neck the many-hued beads she was wearing,
 Slipped them into his hand, as a gift for the beautiful maiden,
 Far in the land of the East, who ever waited his coming.
 Vainly the yellow-haired youth tried to find words for an answer,
 Over his face flashed a look, like the sky in a midsummer shower,
 Alternate cloud and sun; but then she eagerly pleaded,
 Urging him not to delay, for every moment was precious,
 Told him the pathway would lead him ere nightfall out of the forest.
 She herself, would return by a winding trail that she knew of,
 Safe to the Senecac village, long ere the fall of twilight.
 Troubled, the stranger looked in the dark, eager eyes of the maiden,
 Taking her slender hand, he kissed the little brown fingers,
 Silently turned away, and slowly moved down the pathway,
 Turning at every step to wave farewell to the maiden.
 Quiet and calm she stood, as he passed through the glistening sunlight,
 All the scarlet and gold, and the shimmering light of the morning
 Swam in the mist o'er her eyes, and blended all in together,
 Then, as it cleared away, she saw he had stopped at the turning,
 Long he stood there in silence, then vanished of in the forest.

FRANCES ALLEN ANGEVINE, '06.

ing and again torment the village."

"I'm going to clear out," said James, knocking a beetle off the tip of his nose. He walked toward the door, but before he had proceeded ten feet, Quack seized him by the neck and pushed him violently back. The "Professor" was maddened by the fact that the beetles had escaped from his trap, and his sole thought was to prevent their exit from the building. In his state of lunatic excitement, "Odd Job" Harry's departure meant also that of the insects. The loud tone of Quack's voice penetrated the gloomy house of bugs.

"I will perish a martyr to science, and perform a deed that will place my name in the immortal pages of history. With the explosive chemical, the intended destroyer of the beetles, I will blow this building and myself into space, thereby releasing Chugs from a renewal of this horrible pest."

"What about me?" meekly inquired James.

"You will be my companion in death and likewise obtain fame in sixty seconds," and the lunatic searched for his chemicals. "Odd Job" Harry was beginning to wish that h was somewhere else, and accordingly, he started for the door. It was locked. It only took him an instant to climb upon the window sill, a hole was kicked through the pane in another instant, and James quickly found a resting place on the pavement below. He picked himself up and took to his heels. Scarcely had he turned the corner before a reverberating crash shook the whole vicinity. Wood and mortar were thrown high into the air. He retraced his steps. A cloud of dust hid the former site of the building. The whole population soon gathered around the ruins, discussing the strange occurrence and questioning James Harry. Searching parties hunted for Quack without success.

The potato bugs had disappeared as completely as had the cracked "Professor." Although it may be a coincidence, never has one of these troublesome insects again made its appearance in the vicinity. Quack was a second St. Patrick. Ireland's hero drove snakes from the country but he must divide his honors with the "Professor" who drove bugs from Chugs.

Today, a monument marks this historic place and any interested person may read this inscription:

Long live the memory of Quack,
Thus prematurely laid on his back,
A martyr to bugs,
Though the saviour to Chugs,
May no peace his soul ever lack.

The School on the Genesee

Music by Russel K. Rockfeller.

Words by Arthur E. Williams.

On the banks of the tumbling Genesee,
Far famed in song and story,
Winding down, through the busy town,
God's fairest stream is she.
There's Yale, Cornell and Harvard fair,
And other schools there be;
But take them all, none can compare
With the school on the Genesee.

CHORUS.

In her praise we will sing, let the chorus ring,
And ascending pierce the sky;
We've faith in the men of Rochester to win
So cheer the foe to defy.
2,000 sons we're loyal and true and ours is the victory,
For together we bear the purple banner fair
Of the school on the Genesee.

The Genesee flows steadily on, naught can her strength oppose
'Twixt the vine-clad hills, through the valley fair
We'll bear our colors through life's fray,
Pure and spotless they will be.
At the gate of Heaven the banner we'll lay
Of the school on the Genesee.
To the deep blue lake she flows.

Reflections

Music by R. K. Rockfeller.

Words by Arthur E. Williams.

Where the blue hills rear their sun-kissed heights
In silent grandeur to the sky,
Mute tribute to the Creator's might
The peaceful valley smiles her reply.
And the river as she flows on her winding way,
Ever onward to Ontario's waves,
Sings as she flows on night and day
Her song in East High's praise.

CHORUS.

How my heart is sighing
For those days beyond recall,
For the hopes and joy of a High School boy
In my Alma Mater's hall.
Time can never lessen as the years roll ceaseless by
The love and honor I bear thee,
My Alma Mater, East High.

A mighty host defend her name
Through the breadth of this fair land,
Winning for her glory and for her fame,
Shoulder to shoulder they stand.
But I cease to grieve, the thought comes to me
In the rank of that Army of the Sky,
That we all will reunited be,
My school mates of old East High.

The Spectator

Not long ago our worthy editor criticized pretty severely the methods employed by the various classes in conducting their class-meetings. As the Spectator noticed some little difference between the meetings of his own class and the one described by the editor, he decided to investigate further. When next he heard a meeting of the Freshman class announced he betook himself thither. Concealed in his invisible cloak, he waited and watched, but what he saw differed greatly from what he had been led to expect.

About twelve minutes after the time for which the class had been called, two youths appeared on the scene. However, they did not run and jump as said our editor, but instead progressed slowly and painfully with dragging footsteps, as if, indeed, some invisible magnet drew them unwillingly to the spot. They looked about vaguely for the proper study-room, and then, settling themselves opposite the door and against the railing of the stairway, they waited silently. Hardly five minutes passed before another member appeared, much in the same manner as the first two, and soon after the party numbered five. By that time the meeting was ready to be called to order, and the Spectator had seen enough. Doubtless the meeting was held and the proper men elected,—the Spectator has not inquired,—but, as he turned to go, four of the five, who belonged to the Students Association, were endeavoring to find a presiding officer, as there had been no president of the class for some time.

Vacation! How every one of us jumps at the word! How everyone longs for it to commence! Is there any sweeter moment in our lives than that when, with all the strength we possess, we sling our school-books into the corner, and cry aloud, "Vacation is here"? For as much as ten days we gloat over our freedom, and about then our paternal ancestor comes around with a proposal to the effect that we find some place to work pretty quick! We object strenuously, but we obey, and cram our multitudinous projects for a good time into Saturday afternoons and work-day evenings.

Some of us, however, are not subject to such indignities, and will undoubtedly make many plans for the summer. The athlete and the fusser will hie themselves to the festive summer resort, there to astonish the natives, one by his wonderful exhibitions of East High-trained muscle, and the other by, perchance, the elegance of his attire. One might expect from the grinds much wailing and gnashing of teeth that they will be no longer able to win praise and prominence in their classes, but very likely they will find fully as much solid enjoyment in rooting around in the under fields of study and research which they will now have time to explore. The officials of the Roman State will undoubtedly be a very busy lot this summer, and with their Roman noses together will plan many new trials and treasons for the coming year. And what of the East High girls? True, one finds grinds and athletes and Roman citizens among their number also, and these will conduct themselves in much the same manner as their brothers. But as for the others,—well, if it were not for just one thing, the Spectator would express his opinion of them also. That one reason, however, is all important; and it is that the Spectator no longer travels incognito. That makes a vast difference!

Yes, it is now time for the Spectator, who has been so zealous in clearing various mysteries that have perplexed his readers, to dissolve the last of these,—which, perhaps, is not so much of a mystery to most as he would wish to have it,—and to reveal his hidden identity. So, he now steps down from his Spectatorial Chair, and cheerfully submits himself as a common subject of his successor to whom he wishes a long and prosperous reign.

Humbly and fearfully at your mercy,

Clarke F. Hunn.

Editorials

This issue brings to a close the CLARION's 6th year of existence. Each year it has grown just a little in one way or another, and this year has been no exception to the general rule. Since October and November the CLARION has increased in stature to the extent of twelve additional pages, and has sought each month not only to place before its readers more reading matter, but also to make each number more interesting than the last. In the latter endeavor the Clarion Board has had to depend almost wholly upon the student body, and it is noticeable that they have had little reason for disappointment. Next year's prospects are very encouraging, and it is hoped that next September the CLARION may start out, not at its lowest ebb, as in former years, but with as large and interesting an issue as has been produced at any time this year.

Among the different things that are being planned for next year's CLARION, there is one which, because of its novelty, will perhaps attract more attention than any of the others. This is the establishment of a sort of competitive system for the selection of the Assistant Manager.

OUR FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY

Buffalo appropriates for the support of its Free Public Library $76,615

Rochester appropriates for the support of its Free Public Library $00,000

In large colleges the Assistant Manager of the teams and similar enterprises are not chosen from the student-body at large, but are selected from a certain few who for several months have been qualifying for these positions. During the year these few have been working faithfully under the command of the present Manager, performing the many little tasks which are in his charge, and at the same time learning the ins and outs of his office. At the end of the season the Manager chooses the one from this number who has shown the greatest capability and who has done the best work, as his successor.

It is this system or a modification of it, which the Clarion Board wishes to introduce. More will be said of it next year, but it behooves those among the lower classes who have any inclination toward this part of the CLARION work to be considering the matter, and to be ready to come at the first call.

With the issue of this number the most wished for and pleasantest event of school life—the summer vacation—comes clearly into view. It means much to every student, but perhaps most of all to those who have been faithfully performing their tasks through the long year, and now having worked steadily can take their rest with the consciousness of a hard task well done. To all its readers, however, the CLARION wishes the best time to be found anywhere. And may those who leave for good never forget the old Alma Mater.

The CLARION wishes to acknowledge its indebtedness to Mr. George Lennox, June, '08 for the drawings for the various cuts in this issue.

The Old school building silent stood,—no sound
Of life within, its towers long since fall'n.
The moon bathed all the old familiar stones
In floods of silv'ry light. The clock struck twelve.
Then dawn, vague glimm'ring through the night, a band
Of spirits passed—the ghosts of June, '06.
In groups of twos and threes—by nines and tens
They soft descended down the moonbeams' path,
And through the ruins roamed, recalling old,
Old recollections, and the joys of days
Long past. But first they all together met
In the old Assembly Hall. The President
Addressed the class, and spoke of happy times
They all had had in days long, long ago.
Here dear old Wilcox oft had calmed the mob,
And oft had turned their youthful minds to high
And noble things, and education's value showed.
Fond memories of his work came back to those
Assembled there.—By self-forgetting toil
Worn down, his hair grew thinner, thinner till
He died! ! ! !

Then when the ceremonies were complete,
The tributes paid to all, they wandered forth
Again in groups—to each its sev'ral way.
Through corridors now filled with mould o'er cracks
In floor, past broken walls and shatter'd glass
They passed. "Do you remember Betz?" one asked,
As in a small chaotic room they stood.

"Of mathematics he was built; and all
"His sections formed by calculation true.
"His body was a prismatoid—his nose
"To law of signs conformed. Above his eyes
"Projected far those huge manitasses of
"Five oughty points." "And there across the hall,
"Professor Gray his regnum rexit, whose
"Werid fertile brain developed all the scheme
"Of Roman life to modern times brought down—
"Elections—banquets—trials—all in most
"Approv'd ancient fashion done." One floor
Above, they paused and lingered long about
Another room. "Ah, here old 'Baldy' used
"To teach. I well remember yet his eye
"In kindly, genial humor squint." "Ah dear
"Old men—they did their duty and we loved
"Them then and love them now." Another group
A diff'rent course pusued, and stood beside
A room whose door the number "20" bore.
In voices hushed with awe—with solemn awe,
They whispered 'mongst themselves of olden days
When this was known both far and wide; reserved
For the Fusser's Club.

Here Shoop and Stahlbrodt, little Rutherford too,
Bohacket, Bentley, and the rest, to sport
Away the idle hours were fain, with fair
Companions whom I dare not name for fear
Some note of anger might disturb their sweet

Melodious voices soft, and I should hear
Celestial harmony by earth's harsh note
To discord turned. But how can I relate
The mem'ries which to each returned; how can
I tell how Force recalled his baby tricks;
And Levis brought to mind his lectures free
On temperance and on using 'trots'. Enough,
My tale must just here close. The dawn appeared;
The Ghosts flew hence upon the rays of the morning star.
The day then dawned—the last—the Day of Doom.

A Toast

(A. D. 1950.)

Here's to the Old School!
To our sorrows, to our many joys
Here's to the pranks we played, you and I,
When we were girls and boys.
Here's to the teachers who helped us
And never received due praise.
To the Old School!
To the good old days!

Here's to the Old School!
Raise your glasses, fill them foaming high.
Here's to the times of our merry youth,
Here's to the days gone by.
To those of us who are present,
To those who have gone their ways
To the Old School!
To the good old days.

K. H. P.

A sailor from Saut St. Marie
Had a wife living near Manastee,
And two others from Maine
So the chemist explained,
He's a salt with a valence of three.

I.

Congratulate us, we are through,
You guess we know a thing or two,
I tell you that no half-way fool
Can struggle through E. H. School.

II.

You must have brains and be a grind
Or you will slowly fall behind.
I wish to make it plain you see,
What clean people we must be.

III.

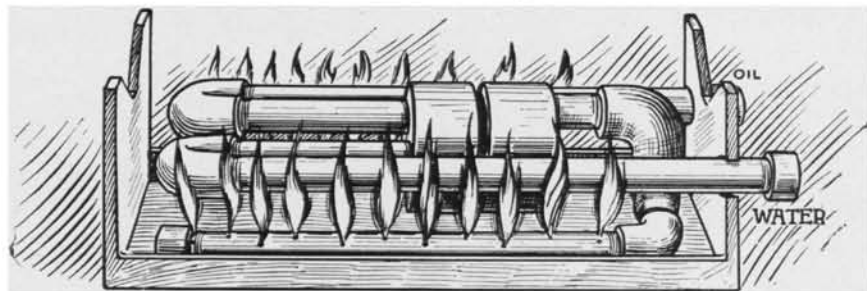

Now go to college you who will,
Of study I have had my fill,
With knowledge now my head is sore
It will not hold a fraction more.

IV.

The E. H. School will soon have fame,
For we '06 will win a name,
The trusts will squeal, all wrongs we'll right,
So wellwe're girded for the fight.

RUPPERT, '07.

IT BURNS WATER, NOT COAL

THIS BURNER MADE TO FIT ANY RANGE OR COOK STOVE

READ THIS CAREFULLY

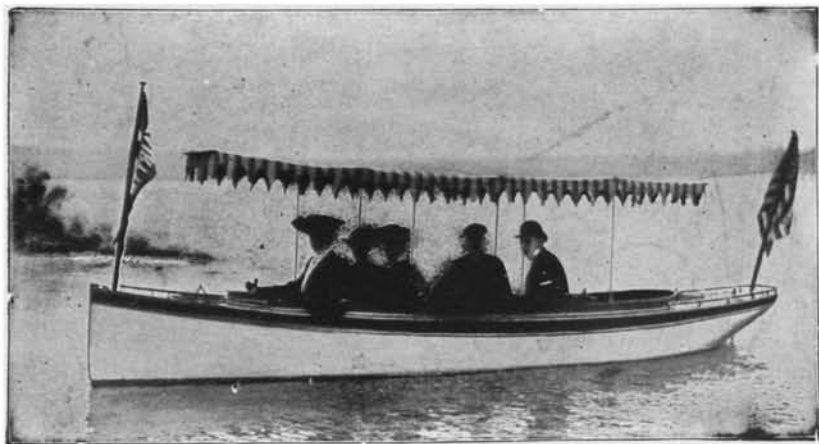

BURNING WATER

Read every word of this discription carefully, as it will help you in thinking out the right name to call our new burner. The illustration shows the burner ready to put into any ordinary cook stove. This burner is composed of metal pipes and a metal drum into one side of which water is admitted, crude oil being admitted into the other side. The heat of the burning flame decomposes the water into its elements and combines it with the oil, which is generated by the heat, thus forming a very powerful mixture, which burns with an intense flame at the perforations in the lower tubes. The tremendous heat generated by these flames is sufficient to produce the gas which the apparatus consumes, and at the same time to heat any cook stove sufficiently hot so that one could boil clothes on the front of the stove, fry meat on the back of the stove and bake in the oven at the same time. The intensity of the heat can be easily regulated by increasing or decreasing the amount of water and crude oil that is fed into the burner. A stove can be run at baking heat for a period of ten hours continuously AT A COST OF ABOUT FIVE CENTS. This is due to the fact that the water, which forms the principal part of the fuel, costs nothing.

Stop a moment. Think what a wonderful revolution in heating methods this burner means. Water is composed of oxygen and hydrogen, the basis of all heat-giving compounds. The decomposition of the water in this burner and the combination of the hydrogen with the elements of the oil, forms a new combustible mixture of the greatest heating power at a cost which has never before been equaled for cheapness.

POWER'S BLOCK

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

The thorough business education that can be acquired by high school graduates in the

Rochester Business Institute

within the space of a few months, is made possible only by the special facilities for such work possessed by the school and the improved methods of instruction employed.

This school has steadily kept pace with the best systems in use, and has so far perfected the organization of its departments and courses of study as to secure the most rapid progress consistent with thoroughness.

The Banking and Business practice department of the

Rochester Business Institute

is conceded to be unsurpassed in any other school and its Typewriter Department, recently greatly enlarged and improved and containing over one hundred new typewriters, is not equalled anywhere in the state outside of New York City.

The school has no vacations, the sessions continuing throughout the summer. Students are thus enabled to enter to advantage at any time of the year.
